The structural adjustment programme which the Government denies the existence of is a palpable reality in Cape Verde and has the support of international financial institutions, and in particular the World Bank.

Furthermore, within the framework of this programme and contrary to the position of the UNTC-CS and the majority of Cape Verde workers, the Government has started a far-reaching revision of the labour law, abolishing a substantial part of the rights and privileges of workers, and through the liberalization of long-term contracts increasing the precariousness and instability of employment. At the same time, a plan has just been implemented which is aimed at reducing the number of public servants, which will lead to hundreds if not thousands of unemployed. They will join the ranks of the hundreds who have already become unemployed as a result of privatization and the redeployment of workers in labour-intensive activities.

The difficult and disturbing situation which I have outlined requires greater attention on the part of the ILO which should increase the support it has given Cape Verde up until now so as to strengthen and consolidate our young and fragile democracy.

This support should be directed towards both the Government and the social partners, to enable them to take up the challenges they face.

The workers of Cape Verde are aware of the urgent need for economic development in this country and of the sacrifices which will have to be made and shared by all.

The workers of Cape Verde know that the economic efficiency and effectiveness sought through privatization, the redeployment of workers in labour-intensive activities and the reduction of public service personnel must take into account the legitimate rights of the workers, such as the right to work and to employment security, the right to social security, the right to education and to vocational training, etc.

We would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the ILO on its 75th anniversary. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO presented at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference contains a number of themes and issues of paramount importance for the future of the ILO. At the same time, the UNTC-CS agrees with the position of the Workers' group of the Governing Body of the ILO in the document The ILO towards the 21st century which it drew up and submitted to the attention of the Director-General of the ILO.

However, I would like to stress that the mandate of the ILO which was established in 1919 and renewed in 1944 is still both valid and topical. The ILO must firmly pursue its action in its particular areas of competence such as the protection and promotion of trade union rights, the development of international standards and the strengthening of tripartism and workers' education.

We would like to congratulate you on the ILO for its initiatives in favour of Portuguese-speaking African countries. These initiatives are both necessary and indispensable, but should also include the creation and implementation of common and specific programmes and projects for the respective trade union organizations.

Finally, allow me to use this rostrum to salute and congratulate the hard-working and heroic people of South Africa for the freedom won and the defeat of apartheid, as well as for the great example they have provided to Africa and the whole world, during and after the first free democratic elections held in their country.

Original Spanish: Mr. SIMITI PALACIO (Workers' delegate, Panama) – In my capacity as Workers' representative from the Republic of Panama I have the honour to take the floor at the 81st International Labour Conference of the ILO.

I would like to extend to the President, the Secretary-General and all the technical departments of the ILO my congratulations for the arduous tasks they have accomplished in seeking lasting peace and social justice for all the marginalized people in our society.

This year's Conference is of particular importance, not only because of the agendas to be discussed by the Working Committees but also because of the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. These historical events have marked new and promising steps in the development of the contemporary world in the field of social justice and the humanization of labour.

However, a global crisis is facing the labour field as we approach the twenty-first century in the light of privatization strategies arising from neo-liberal policies. The implication is that man should be at the service of the economy and not vice versa.

Within this framework we cannot fail to mention the dire consequences of galloping unemployment which above all affects developing countries; the intensification of labour via foreign maquiladoras which is turning workers into robots and endangering their health; the impoverishment of the farming sector arising from the system of quotas imposed on Latin American economies by the European Union with respect to export products such as coffee, sugar, bananas and staple grains. In the near future all of this will lead to the collapse of the economy of the poorest countries.

With respect to trade unions, I would like to refer to the most important aspects in our country since the invasion in 1989, which wreaked havoc on the Panamanian economy, fundamentally dependent as it is on services and certain export goods.

Unemployment consequently rose 18 per cent; massive dismissals in the public and private sector have been and continue to be a tragic blow to the workers in our country. Elsewhere, ruinous laws have been promulgated, including the Act No. 25 which decapitated the trade union movement by dismissing its most outstanding leaders without respecting legal provisions.

In my overview, I cannot fail to refer to the reforms – counterproductive for people – with respect to the social security system, the increased retirement age and the elimination of early retirement. This affects labour sectors such as industrial and construction workers and others by accelerating the ageing process. Employment accidents and occupational diseases are increasing at an alarming rate, owing to the use of agrochemicals and pesticides banned by the WHO. All of this is due to the lack of a preventive policy among government authorities.

Advances made by labour have been nullified, due to erroneous interpretations of cases by labour courts; the wage policy is insufficient to offset price hikes in the basic basket, which is drawing further out of reach of the people. These are but a few of the serious problems worthy of mentioning, and they are a burden on Panamanian society.

Despite this rather sombre overview of the situation, I would like to point out that recently we have held elections in our country, characterized by transparency and honesty. Many international observers witnessed them, and they have paved the way to a democratic transition and a good outlook for economic growth with social development.

Nevertheless, the Panamanian trade union movement will remain watchful with respect to the offers made by the new government which will assume office as of 1 September 1994. It has committed itself to intensifying social programmes aimed at reducing the gap between the rich and the poor, the latter currently standing at 50 per cent of our population, 33 per cent of whom are critically poor.

I would like to refer briefly to certain statements by the Director-General in his Report to the 81st Session of the Conference and which relate to the revision of the system of international Conventions whereby they should be adapted to the process of change as we move towards the twenty-first century without substantially changing those which need to be applied systematically in the present and in the future.

We agree with the initiative of the Governing Body of the ILO with respect to the preparation of an annual report on world employment and income, and another analysis of the impact these variables have on the political, economic and financial context of this multipolar world which governs international relations and the indices showing variations in employment and income worldwide.

This is important because it is part and parcel of the fate of workers, within both the legal and socio-economic framework.

Therefore, it is our fervent wish that the ILO, which was established in 1919, can efficiently meet this historic challenge with respect to achieving a more just society within the context of new economic models.

Original Russian: Mr. KOLMOGOROV (Employers' delegate, Russian Federation) – Allow me first of all to extend my greetings to the participants of this anniversary session of the ILO on behalf of the Russian Industrialists and Entrepreneurs' Union and the employers' associations which are members of the Russian Tripartite Committee on Social and Labour Relations.

Our delegation is pleased to note that the main points in the Report of the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, are not dedicated to summarizing the past achievements and activities of the ILO, as might have been expected on the occasion of this anniversary, but rather to reflecting on the future of the Organization and the effective use of its truly unique possibilities in the new circumstances.

The radical changes taking place in the world today make it ever more obvious that our world is highly interdependent.

There is no doubt that these changes create a solid basis for the elimination of bipolar rivalries and the strengthening of a single world community. They offer a truly unique opportunity to take a new tack in our approach to cooperation and to make more effective use of the philosophy, values and experience of the International Labour Organization.

In general terms, what can and must the ILO do to contribute to establishing a system of global planning and to ensure that the world community is well organized and can be managed successfully? The answer to this question will shape the solutions to the problems facing mankind and will substantially affect the life of future generations.

In this connection, I am certain that the conclusions already expressed at this session of the Conference and with which we are in full agreement deserve special support. There is indeed a need for a revision of the way in which the ILO and its institutions work and for a departure from a certain sterile intellectualism to a more open and a freer exchange of views on the problems facing the world today.

Since the anthology published for this session contains an article by Mr. A. Volsky, the President of the Industrialists and Entrepreneurs' Union of Russia, on the basic ideas of our Organization on this theme, I will limit my speech to a few points concerning the practical activity of the ILO.

Firstly, we believe the extensive and rapid change taking place throughout the world requires a more rapid adaptation of the content of ILO activities and structures. They must adapt to the realities of the complicated processes taking place in the countries, regions and subregions of the world.

It has already been noted how complicated and slow the transition from a centrally planned economy to a market economy has been in most of the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. This applies fully to Russia.

At the same time I would like to emphasize that in Russia we are moving irreversibly towards an economy which will offer a more effective machinery of production and distribution. There is no doubt that Russian society has entered a new phase of development now that the basic absolutist idea of macroeconomic system has collapsed. A new Constitution has been adopted, and a new Parliament has been elected. There have been changes in the Government. A Presidential Declaration to the Federal Assembly has thrown light on the vital question of the need to choose our own Russian way towards a market economy. And although the economic situation is still very difficult, our Organization's experts have forecast that by the end of this year, and possibly in the autumn, we can expect a certain amount of stabilization: the rate of the drop in production should fall to 12 per cent and the monthly average inflation rate will be reduced to 10 per cent. We can now say that Russian society is in a relatively calm period. To a great extent, the Agreement on Consensus, which was signed by the majority of influential political forces and various public organizations, movements and trade unions, has helped foster this relative calm.

In this connection, it should be mentioned that in the so-called post-communist countries, too much still depends on the effect of the economy on social matters, and eventually on politics. The world community is so interlinked today that it would be naive to suppose that upheavals (if they cannot be avoided) in Central and Eastern Europe and in the territory of the former Soviet Union will not have very serious effects for the whole of mankind.

While we understand that a successful solution to the problems facing these countries depends firstly on their own dynamism and their readiness to pay a certain price for innovation, we consider that in the coming period the role of the International Labour Organization must increase in integrating these countries and in ensuring the unity of action of the world community to guarantee social justice and economic progress.

Such an approach must be reflected in the priorities of the ILO and in the activities of its structures, especially at the subregional level.

In this connection, we believe it is particularly important to set up and properly direct the work of the Office's multidisciplinary team which was recently set up in Budapest. It is obviously now too late to talk about the choice of location for this team. But it is clear that its work must in the first place be coordinated with the general programme of activities for all of the ILO's structures. Secondly, it must really be in the centre of the events taking place in Central and Eastern Europe. It must have a programme of action which corresponds to the specific needs of the development of a tripartite approach. It must also take account of the circumstances I have just mentioned, and above all it must be able to bring to light and share out the practical experiences of problem-solving in these countries so as to ensure greater success in the reforms. We are also convinced that there is a need to give the Moscow office of the ILO greater resources to this end.

Finally, I should like to make one remark. We support the proposals made by Mr. Kapartis, the Secretary-General of the International Organization of Employers, about the need to increase the support of entrepreneurship in the practical activities of the ILO, in its programme and budget as a whole, and especially in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. For not only is it true that without free associations of employers there can be no valid bargaining process and of course no tripartite approach to solving labour problems. That much is obvious. But in addition, without the development of entrepreneurship there can be no productive regional economy, and this means that there can be no effective international organization of labour as a condition for achieving better and more dignified living conditions, social justice and peace. These are the ideals at the basis of the ILO's work, and the ones to which we all aspire and subscribe.

(Mr. Gray takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. VALLARINO (Employers' delegate, Panama) – It is my honour to congratulate Messrs. Gray, Mendoza, Ould Sidi and Matinchev on their election as President and Vice-Presidents of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and I wish them all the very best in conducting the deliberations of this august assembly.

Almost all the speakers who have taken the floor, including the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, have referred to one undeniable fact – that the world has fundamentally changed in the last few years, above all since the collapse of the Soviet Empire.

These geopolitical changes with their undeniable effect on ideology plus the rapid pace of technological change in the world are facing us more and more urgently with the need radically to review the nature of production relationships in enterprises.

New ideologies, new technologies, new forms of work, all constantly being put to the test are heralding a new world in which the only constant variable shall be that of change.

For this reason when we talk about tripartism as we have known it in the first 75 years of the ILO, we are sort of renouncing the role of the ILO as an agent of change and its successful work in promoting social justice worldwide. Today we must seek new relations between the factors of production making them more human, effective and just, although inevitably more complicated than in the conditions inherited from the Industrial Revolution when we only acknowledged the relationship between capital and labour, perforce antagonistic.

I think I have clearly understood the message expressed by the Secretary-General and other speakers with respect to the second 75 years of the ILO, which must be fundamentally different, otherwise the Organization and all that it represents may be overtaken by the course of events and become anachronistic and irrelevant.

Fortunately, people are aware of the fact that we must adapt to change within this Organization to guarantee its relevance and leading role in the future.

The Panamanian employers that I represent here today are proud of being able to inform the International Labour Conference that our country is at the vanguard of this search and that we are pursuing our task in a creative and productive way on the basis of an ongoing and united effort by both sides of industry.

For our country and particular situation we have found an appropriate instrument in the form of a new institution called the Foundation of Labour. This institution, which is recognized and supported by the national Government has provided new and real opportunities, for the first time in fact, for a tripartite dialogue in our country.

There are certain characteristics and fundamental processes of the Foundation of Labour which ensure its effective functioning and open up favourable prospects for the future.

Above all I would like to stress its structure. The structure of the Foundation of Labour provides for absolute equality between employers and workers. It also includes all the employers' association of the country via the National Council of Private Enterprise (CONEP) and the five main trade union associations within the Panamanian Council of Organized Workers (CONATO).

Its leadership also includes a board of trustees with five members from each sector, and two lists of dignitaries who try to reach consensus. However, its most novel aspect is that the dignitaries from the labour side are chosen by the employers and the dignitaries from the employers' side are chosen by the workers. This eliminates the risk of no irreconcilable incompatibilities which could undermine the organization.

With regard to the management of the Foundation, one of the major characteristics is that all decisions are taken on the basis of consensus.

On the other hand, great emphasis is placed on informal and abundant communication. Every week we have working lunches, open to all and without a set agenda, which is a great help to structured dialogue when it is necessary.

Another key feature of our Foundation is that both sides have accepted first of all to talk about the interests we have in common and then, if we have time, to look at matters that we do not agree on.

The first field identified as of common interest was the need to promote the economic development of the country, to create more jobs, and this is such a vast and intricate subject that the Foundation has not had time or been able to look at other areas.

The result of more than one year of continuous dialogue has been that we have identified a number of fundamental projects to upgrade information on the labour market, such as placement by the Foundation and initiatives to develop human resources including a workers' university.

Another important move has been the establishment of a committee made up of economists representing both workers and employers, and despite undeniable ideological differences they have been able to agree on a text on the nature of the economic development our country needs. This text, which is soon to be presented to the national Government, is a most important step in the search for a national consensus which will lead us to a national development strategy which can be adopted and supported by all the social actors in our country.

Now, the Foundation is preparing to discuss and arrive at a consensus with teachers so that we can draw up a national education which is universally acceptable. This is a challenge which governments in our country have been seeking in vain to meet for over 20 years. But the Foundation of Labour believes that we must succeed, as an education plan is a basic prerequisite for the overall development of our country.

This search for solutions and common interests has, I am sure, contributed to dialogue and mutual knowledge among the two sectors making it now possible for tripartite dialogue not only to help find new and better forms of association within production but also make the country easier to govern.

Let me wind up by saying that our enthusiasm and optimism for what we have achieved in very little time and the enormous hopes we have for the future are why we wanted to share our experience with you, as a case study for the ILO, because we feel that this provides the seeds of how new relations should be in the second stage of the ILO in the next 75 years.

Mr. IOANNOU (Workers' delegate, Cyprus) – First of all, I should like to congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference on their election to steer the deliberations of this Conference. I am confident that under their guidance, their experience and their wisdom the Conference will be a successful one and will constitute a landmark in the history of the ILO.

This year's session of the Conference has a special significance. We are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO. This is a unique opportunity for serious contemplation. We are at a crossroads, where serious developments, political and economical are taking place – and inevitably these are affecting workers. It is reasonable to expect that the Conference will proceed with a detailed evaluation of what the ILO has succeeded in doing so far. However, the suggestions and ideas which will be put forward can contribute to defining the future course of the ILO and will be based on the expectations of the member States – but mainly on the expectations of the workers whom the ILO has essentially pledged to help.

I believe that there will be unanimity on one point – that the contribution of the ILO has been positive during the 75 years it has been functioning. There is no worker in the world who has not benefited to a greater or lesser extent from the actions and decisions taken so far by the ILO.

The ILO in its 75th year of its existence has offered great services to mankind. There is no doubt that the Organization has contributed to a great extent to the effectiveness of the struggle of the labour movement both at the national and international level, and towards the compilation and prevalence of human rights and trade union freedoms. Furthermore, the ILO, with the decisions adopted by its Conferences, with the mechanisms at its disposal and its continuous activities, has proven to be a valuable aid in attempts to attain social justice and better working conditions and the combat to end racial discrimination and promote equal treatment for men and women.

The ILO also has cause to be proud of the promotion of the principle of tripartite cooperation, whereby the representatives of the workers and the employers cooperate with the representatives of the governments and participate in free discussions to promote the common goals and the proper handling of problems affecting wage earners in everyday life. If we compare the conditions prevailing at the time when the ILO was first founded with those we have today, we can see the substantial differences and progress that has been achieved. The ILO has contributed much to the success of this progress.

The workers' and employers' organizations – but also the governments – recognize and appreciate the work of the ILO. The number of member States of the ILO increases from year to year. This, in my opinion, bears witness to the trust enjoyed by our international organization which translates into trust, respect and recognition, the principles promoted on an everyday basis by the ILO.

Almost all governments accept these principles – at least in theory – and declare that they apply them. In my opinion what matters is how they interpret these principles and how they apply them in practice. Unfortunately, there are many instances where we can witness violations of human rights and trade union freedoms.

It is not my intention to refer to specific cases, but it is well known that there are countries where organized labour movements are under attack. Many trade union leaders are arrested, in prison, and even murdered or have disappeared.

As an example, I would like to refer to my own country, Cyprus. We are a European country, but we are deprived of basic human rights. A foreign power invaded my country 20 years ago – on the pretext of protecting peace – and is forcefully occupying even today more than one-third of its territory. Basic human rights – such as freedom of movement, the free choice of the place of work, the right to return to our own homes – are, after much deprivation and toil, still being violated.

The ILO must reinforce its mechanism of examining complaints regarding the violation of these fundamental principles. Every government which violates human rights and trade union freedoms gives excuses. It is easy to give excuses. The point is, how do they justify these excuses? In our day and age, if we want true social justice and progress and peace to prevail, it is necessary to reinforce the mechanism which looks into such violations. We believe that the ILO, despite maintaining such a mechanism – and we recognize the work it has performed to date – must considerably enforce it to render it more effective.

It is well known that the ILO not only confines itself to promoting and safeguarding these fundamental principles. It has a great record of achievement in setting standards for terms and conditions of work. Without doubt the setting of such standards promotes the principle of social justice. Various arguments have been put forward that the ILO has succeeded to a great extent in setting standards for employment and as a result, the world of work is over-regulated. We do not believe that this argument is valid. In the field of setting standards much work remains for the ILO.

Today, the economic situation is changing. The economies of countries are continuously becoming more and more interdependent, the multinationals are growing and the time will soon come when they have such a marked economic influence that they will affect in a number of ways the policies of governments, especially social policies. Investments undoubtedly affect employment. Wherever they may come from, either from local capital or from the multinationals – or from the World Bank or the International Monetary Fund – they must always take into consideration the social role they have to play in a community. The ILO, as the foremost advocate of the principle of social justice, must be in a position to influence investment policy and affect the policy of these organizations.

Due to time constraints, I cannot go further into detail on other vital issues; but I would like merely to say that my organization supports the specific proposals put forward by the Workers' group to the Governing Body. We consider them very sound.

Let me conclude with a final remark. The Declaration of Philadelphia, which was adopted 50 years ago, clearly states "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". Millions of people live today in conditions of want, poverty and illiteracy. Human rights and trade union freedoms are being brutally violated by many governments and millions of people live under the yoke of oppression. May this year's Conference mark a decisive point in our history to combat poverty worldwide and to consolidate social justice and the respect of human and trade union freedoms.

Original French: Mr. LAWANI (Workers' delegate, Benin) – I would like to congratulate the President on his election. I wish him every success in the post he will occupy during this session.

As you know, the entire world celebrates the 75th anniversary of the creation of our Organization, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia this year.

The workers of my country, the Republic of Benin, whatever their affiliation may be, join in the celebrations which started with the opening of the present session on 7 June 1994.

In their name and in my own name, I would therefore like to extend to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference our sincere and heartfelt congratulations for the quality of the work which has been achieved so far.

It is impossible to list the many achievements of our Organization without giving special mention to all those who in one way or another have contributed to the development of its activities.

People more qualified than myself have already eloquently commented on the exceptional record of the International Labour Organization. It remains for me to pay a well-deserved tribute to all those who have contributed to the success which we can admire today.

Nevertheless, these successes and numerous achievements which are reflected in the diversity and the quality of our Organization's work must not distract us from examining the present conditions which prevail as we celebrate this anniversary.

Indeed, the political, economic, social and cultural situation of Africa in general, and of my country, Benin, in particular, is far from brilliant.

Politically speaking, we may rejoice at the peaceful transition to democracy of certain countries.

But at the same time, we cannot help but be concerned about the less fortunate developments that can be seen in many cases.

What is heartening is the declared will of people to bring democratic renewal to a successful conclusion. Here, I would like to salute the victory of the people of South Africa and its prestigious leader Nelson Mandela. This is a victory which was consecrated by the outcome of the recent elections and the establishment of a government of national unity anxious to bring about reforms to make this country a multiracial State based on equality of races.

For the peoples of Liberia, Burundi, Rwanda and Somalia and many others, we hope that dialogue and reason will triumph over tribal or ethnic rivalries and individual or clan-based political ambitions.

As regards the economic situation, the structural adjustment programmes advocated by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank have not saved our countries from monetary crises, and have thus been unable to prevent the devaluation by 50 per cent of the CFA franc in relation to the French franc.

The social situation of workers has suddenly declined still more because of this devaluation. It was already bad enough in recent years.

The poverty caused by massive dismissals resulting from the privatization of enterprises, cutbacks in the public service and unemployment among young graduates who have never held a job has thus been compounded by the generalized and uncontrolled rise in the price of basic necessities. All of this exacerbates the already rampant destitution of all categories and levels of society.

How can we here today not mention the measures planned by the Government of our country to reduce considerably the old-age pensions of those whose pensions fall under the Social Security Office of Benin? We are told that this office underwent restructuring with the participation of an ILO expert.

We think that it is absolutely necessary that the retirement of those people who have done so much for our countries should not be jeopardized by measures which would only hasten the death of these pensioners. Our Conference should be concerned about this problem. In the same way, I would like to denounce firmly the actions of intimidation and interference of our Government. It has recently prohibited demonstrations, threatened strikers with collective dismissal and withheld wages for participation strikes called to demand respect for rights recognized as legitimate by the Government.

All of these facts illustrate very well the scope of the challenges still facing us.

At the cultural level, it is obvious that the economic situation has had a tragic impact on the cultural development of our country. Culture and leisure, which must be considered as needs just like any others, have been relegated to the bottom of the list of workers' concerns, if not completely struck off it, because of financial constraints.

These are some of the realities which the workers of my country have to face.

At a time of such great social gloom, the role of the ILO is still more important.

The ILO, one of the oldest organizations of the United Nations system, has always sought to make its activities fit in with the real and full development of countries by promoting universal peace and social justice.

Despite the efforts made so far, the fact that inequalities and economic and social crises still exist proves that there are still important challenges to be met.

First of all, the desire to foster development must not overshadow our Organization's main field of concern, namely the world of labour, and so, of social questions.

As you know, the field of labour has undergone many changes because of technological and structural changes in the employment market.

National legislations which have not yet followed the development of standards at the ILO unfortunately continue to lag behind and to apply laws which are completely obsolete.

The ILO will have to become much more effective in fighting to improve working conditions, to protect the lives and health of men and women workers in the widest sense of the term, and to protect the environment.

To achieve this while strengthening tripartism, the ILO will have, if necessary, to consider reforms designed to increase the effectiveness of its actions and to ensure a greater number of ratifications by its member States.

The important issue of workers in the informal sector, which was discussed at the 78th Session in 1991, deserves more attention today in view of the fact that this is the only solution for many workers left unemployed by adjustment policies and for new graduates in search of employment.

The importance of the informal sector in the economy of our countries and the large number of workers which participate in it bring up the question of how to organize these workers and, as a result, of how to adapt our legislation to cover this new and real phenomenon. It also raises the question of the need for social protection for this important fringe of the active population.

I am convinced that our Organization will not betray the trust of the workers. We are confident that the management of the devaluation will not be self-destructive for the world of labour in general and for the most vulnerable groups in particular.

The ILO must strengthen its action in favour of true social justice and an economy with a human face.

In conclusion, my organization fully supports the concerns and the views of the Workers' group in the Governing Body of the International Labour Office with regard to the Report of the Director-General.

Original French: Mr. SEM (Government delegate, Cambodia) – It is a great honour and a special privilege for me to take the floor here on this rostrum today.

First and foremost, I would like to avail myself of this opportunity to say a sincere word of thanks from the Royal Government of Cambodia to the ILO for having invited my country to participate in this important Conference.

I would like to remind you that Cambodia has been a Member of the ILO since 1969 and has ratified the following Conventions: the Night Work (Women) Convention, 1919 (No. 4); the Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 6); the White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13); the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29); and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

The Cambodian Government has regularly sent delegations to the International Labour Conferences. From 1975 to 1992, it was not possible for my country to participate in the Organization's activities due to our civil war, and it is with great honour that I head this first delegation, whose task it is, on behalf of the Royal Government of Cambodia, to renew ties of friendship with the ILO. This event is coupled with the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I would like to remind you that the 1970 military coup plunged Cambodia into a murderous civil war in which more than 700,000 people died and 2 million people were forced to flee from their villages to the towns and cities.

On 17 April 1975, the Khmer Rouge radical forces, assumed power and set up Democratic Kampuchea. This regime tried to relocate people, moving them to the countryside in an attempt to create a new Cambodian nation based on community and farming life.

Under this regime, most economic and social infrastructures were dismantled, private property was confiscated, our currency was abolished, schools were closed down, and put to other uses. More than 3,000 Buddhist pagodas were destroyed or used for other purposes, and even as prisons.

Over three years, eight months and 20 days more than 3 million people died of torture, forced labour or inhuman living conditions. This dramatic period of our contemporary history is the only self-genocide which the world has known.

Cambodia has been liberated from the Khmer Rouge since 1978, but this group still remains very active and violent in certain parts of the country.

In 1979, my country was therefore completely ruined and deprived of its intellectuals. The population which survived the terrible conditions of life during the Pol Pot regime will remain traumatized for ever. Even today, these traumata have an impact on the reflexes and mentality of people in my country.

It was ten years later, in November 1989, that Cambodia adopted a market economy and thus opened up to free-trade countries.

On 4 January 1992, the economic embargo, which had been strangling Cambodia until then, was lifted. This decision paved the way for the end of a difficult stage in our history.

In May 1993, for the first time in 20 years, general elections took place under the supervision of the United Nations. Since the end of 1993, the Cambodian National Assembly has once opted for the country to become a monarchy. Prince Sihanouk was appointed King of Cambodia.

I fully agree with the Director-General that the rapid pace change in our world is due to the political revolution, i.e. the collapse of the Eastern economic bloc and the economic revolution (labour and investment mobility).

It is difficult for my country to adapt to these rapid changes.

I would like to focus on the dramatic past of Cambodia, to remind the world of the terror and the chaos my country was faced with from 1975 to 1979, due to the Khmer Rouge regime.

The change from one type of economy to another, of course, rarely occurs without problems, and it is important that this transition be prepared both at structural and at legal levels.

In both fields, Cambodia suffers from a terrible shortage of experts able to plan, organize and analyse this in-depth change in the operation of my country's economy.

The disastrous situation of our own national infrastructure, which I have already mentioned, and the harsh competition brought about by new investors arriving in our country, will probably lead the Government of the Kingdom of Cambodia to adopt a flexible and intelligent investment policy.

Indeed, Cambodia must reinforce its labour legislation policy to protect those in need who, destitute as they are, have to accept the conditions imposed upon them without any possibility of effective or objective recourse.

The Kingdom of Cambodia needs the aid of the ILO, at a central level, so that it can propose an economic development policy which is harmonious and contributes to well-being for all.

Our country suffers from a profound shortage of training opportunities, especially in technical fields.

Acquisition of know-how is the key to development. It is necessary and indispensable to establish vocational training programmes for agriculture, metalwork, woodwork, management, and so on. Furthermore, training centres should be decentralized and not all located in our capital cities.

This programme should therefore be designed to lend assistance to the least-favoured segments in our society – war disabled, war orphans and the handicapped – by the institution of a proportional recruitment system for these schools.

Finally, I would like to congratulate the President, on the way he has chaired the work of the Conference so far, and I would like to assure him of our cooperation to add to his success and in the later implementation of the results of this Conference.

Mr. BROWNE (Secretary of State, Labour, Energy and Power, Sierra Leone) – On behalf of the Chairman and Head of State, His Excellency Captain Valentine Strasser, the National Provisional Ruling Council, the people of the Republic of Sierra Leone and my delegation to this Conference, I have the honour to congratulate the President on his election to the high office of this 81st Session of the Conference. We are confident that the Conference will score successes in achieving the ILO's basic aims, which encompass social justice, human freedom and dignity, economic security and equal opportunity for mankind.

As usual, we are pleased to attend this Conference and to reaffirm the support of the Government of Sierra Leone for the Organization and the Conference.

My delegation acknowledges with delight the Director-General's Report to the Conference, which is meaningful, educative and commendable. This comprehensive Report contains basic facts about the activities of the Organization in meeting the needs of member States. It is noteworthy that "social justice in a global economy" is the theme of the Director-General's Report. My delegation is convinced that the Organization will be able to find a solution to the nightmare of severe imbalances in the global economy, especially at this time when it is such an important occasion as the 75th anniversary of the ILO, one of the oldest international organizations. Although it is a cause for celebration, yet we believe it is time that Members pay greater attention to the provisions in the Declaration of Philadelphia which states, and I quote, "It is a responsibility of the International Labour Organization to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective", that is, social justice. We will therefore have to pay more attention to the future responsibilities of the ILO as many countries are now placing their trust in it by becoming Members and paying their contributions despite the gloomy situation.

Since last year's session of the Conference, the global economic conditions and world peace have not improved at all. If global peace is to be achieved, then social justice must be established by all member States, particularly in developing nations in order to effect favourable economic changes.

My delegation considers the establishment of social justice in a global economy to be the key operation in all talks about world peace, equal justice, equal opportunity, equal rights, full employment and democracy. We know that social justice in a global economy has to mean giving every nation the opportunity to improve and develop the socio-economic situation of its people. This demands some sort of equitable sharing of global wealth which can be achieved by stabilizing the developing countries' export of primary products and the industrialized countries' expansion of trade with developing countries.

In a way, a new democratic system started to unfold in South Africa as Nelson Mandela became the President of that country where people are now allowed to have their own freedom, elect their own officials, have the right to live, liberty and pursuit of happiness. Because of this historic event, my delegation congratulates President Mandela and his National Congress of South Africa as well as the people of South Africa on the overwhelming political victory. We also appreciate the ILO's involvement in this new democracy.

Now my delegation hastens to add that there has been an ongoing rebel war in Sierra Leone. This war has made the country economically crippled by way of paralysing exports, agricultural output, mineral production, investment prospects and self-sustained growth. Secondly, the National Provincial Ruling Council (NPRC) Government has been finding it very difficult to shelter, feed and clothe the displaced people who have deserted their respective regions mainly due to insecurity in their areas.

As our Government strives to bring the devastating rebel war to a speedy end, an appeal is therefore made to the ILO and member States to join hands with Sierra Leone in bringing this war to an end.

It is very important to point out here that since all member States are interdependent in one way or another, no country can stand alone.

While the devastating rebel war continues, the NPRC Government remains deeply committed to the building of the new Republic of Sierra Leone based on social justice, human dignity, equal opportunity and open society with no barriers to advancement and protection. Accordingly, the NPRC Government has embarked upon a series of programmes and policies for sustained economic growth and development. Examples: the National Employment Policy has been formulated to provide services to economically disadvantaged target groups which will be identified within Sierra Leone. Secondly, the Economic Reform Programme of Sierra Leone has been set up to facilitate poverty alleviation from the grassroots upwards. The third major policy is the introduction of the 6-3-3-4 system of education, which means six years of elementary, three years of junior high school, three years of senior high school and four years of college tertiary education. This new system will prepare school children for self-employment and self-reliance. This means the education system in Sierra Leone will now be balanced. Fourthly, a very important major change anticipated is the Legal Reform Programme designed to maintain social justice in Sierra Leone, which means the understanding of social conditions of the people. Fifthly, there is an Agricultural Sector Support Programme to construct roads in rural farming areas to facilitate the smooth running of urban-rural trade and self-employment. Sixthly, an Independent Electoral Commission has been formed to enhance the process for the return to civilian rule. There is now a Council for the development of exports and investment in all sectors of the economy. The Draft Labour Laws submitted by the ILO have been reviewed by the Government and submitted to the ILO for final production. There are other achievements of the NPRC Government but time will not permit me to elaborate.

Original Portuguese: Mr. HUNGUANA (Minister of Labour, Mozambique) – I would like to join with those who have spoken before me in saluting the President of our Conference. I am sure that under his guidance our work will be crowned with success.

Southern Africa, of which Mozambique is a part, is undergoing promising changes which are bringing us the first sight of real peace and development in many years. The end of apartheid and the beginning of the democracy in South Africa constitutes a landmark of overwhelming importance, marking the end of an epoch and the beginning of a new era for the whole region which, following the success of its anti-colonial struggles, had been confronted by the might of apartheid. To feel secure within its own borders, that regime had to sow insecurity among all its neighbours. Such was the system of destabilization based on a so-called total strategy. This is why no country in the region could consider itself truly free as long as apartheid remained dominant in South Africa.

Mozambique is an excellent example of this strategy. Because all those who neither forget history from one day to the next nor start to rewrite it know how decisive the connection with South Africa has been in bringing about the paralysis and virtual destruction of our society.

Speaking here today, in June, 1994, the backdrop to our discussion is different. Our starting point is that of a South Africa free from apartheid, of a South Africa finally free from the spectre of regional destabilization.

However, for peace and development to have a real chance it is vital that the monstrous aims of those who dream and work to reverse history not be allowed to prosper. To this end two objectives are basic to the continuing struggle: elimination or neutralization of the remnants of apartheid, and converting the priceless moral and political support that the international community has given the struggle of the peoples of the region into committed support for their economic development.

The tasks ahead of us are not easy and there will be no simple or quick solution to them. In Mozambique, for example, we must face the accumulated effects of brutal and systematic destruction on a massive scale – an organized turning back of the clock for our country.

Rebuilding will require a great deal of investment, commitment and imagination. But in the new situation, with apartheid gone, this investment, commitment and imagination will have secure terrain on which to work and will thus bear fruit. With your help we in southern Africa both want to be and can be an example, an example that will be the pride not only of the region but of the international community that is engaged with us.

We want to be an example, not because we are better than anyone else but because history is giving us this rare opportunity for peace, freedom and progress, after so many years of repression and war. We do not want to let this opportunity slip, we want to turn it into a concrete reality for the whole region.

To complete these words of greeting to South Africa, on its readmission to the ILO, I would like to add that the transformations we are celebrating today did not fall like manna from heaven – they are the results of the South African people's heroic struggle, organized and led by the ANC and other democratic forces and, as I have said, of the struggle of the peoples of the region.

History has once again proven that in every phase men of stature have emerged to make decisive interventions in the process of history. Nelson Mandela is one of these charismatic geniuses – a man as big as the struggle itself and who above all has an enlightened vision of a great future – so difficult, yet at the same time so human and so possible – the foundations for which are already being laid.

Nelson Mandela knew how to be the right man at the right time for this gigantic task. This is why the tribute we pay him at this and other fora throughout the world will never be excessive. However, it would be unjust to ignore or forget that other men whose understanding of the need for change was so fundamental and timely. Frederik de Klerk, with a vision of a possible future, had the courage to start on the dramatic march which would lead him to emerge, side by side with Mandela, from the long night of apartheid.

My remarks are particularly relevant to the case of Mozambique. Although the economic rehabilitation programme worked out with the IMF and the World Bank has reactivated the economy significantly, we are very far from achieving the targets that have been planned or from solving our problems.

If, on the one hand, the war was an objective constraint on this reactivation, on the other, the concept and mechanisms on which the programme is based have shown themselves to require evaluation and adjustment in the face of worsening unemployment, increased numbers of people living in absolute poverty and deteriorating living standards for the vast majority. It is true that the end of the war, via the signing of the General Peace Agreement in Rome in 1992, creates new conditions under which our programme can operate – in the short term it creates greater requirements for investment and support.

The people who were internally displaced or refugees in neighbouring countries are returning to their areas of origin on a massive scale. Implementation of the Peace Agreement is resulting in the demobilization of around 100,000 government and RENAMO soldiers. All this is within a context in which the relaunching of our economy is only now just beginning in a time of peace. It is not difficult to imagine the magnitude of the challenges we face, particularly in the area of unemployment.

The problem of employment in the case of Mozambique is thus of decisive importance as regards the peace process. The war factor must be converted into the peace factor, reintegrating thousands of demobilized soldiers both economically and socially. Any swelling of the ranks of the unemployed with ex-soldiers and persons returning must be avoided so that a powerful factor for instability and conflict will not be created, where there is already a tradition of resorting to violence.

With the resources at our disposal, it will be virtually impossible to absorb such a large labour force in a short time, unless we enjoy the support of the international community and particularly of the ILO. We are certain that action taken in isolation or the implementation of a single project in isolation from others will not overcome the problem. Our actions must be multifaceted and multidisciplinary and we must set our sights as high as we can.

The support we hope for from the international community, and from the International Labour Organization in particular, should be principally in areas such as the following: capacity building for the bodies working with problems of employment, training and professional guidance; projects to create small and medium-sized businesses; programmes geared towards self-employment; and finally, technical assistance – for implementing projects and programmes in the field of employment and professional training, for evaluating the consequences on employment of economic and financial measures taken, and for preparing action in relation to underemployment, aimed at increasing productivity and maximizing potential of the labour force.

We have received support from the ILO in some areas, but this unfortunately is not yet sufficient to make an impression on the mountainous task confronting us. We believe that in this, as in other fields, there should be greater responsibility and seriousness in channelling the aid provided by the international community to ensure that such aid really does reach those for whom it is intended and helps them resolve the concrete problems defined as priorities. Without this, and if the real priorities are not respected, the little money available will be wasted in the tortuous course of cooperation and will not achieve the aims which the taxpayers in the donor countries have agreed to support.

Finally, 1994 is the year for multi-party elections in Mozambique, and our aim is to hold them in October. We want these elections and we have an absolute need for them as a fundamental stage in the process of peace and post-war normalization.

However, democracy is not just a matter of elections, no matter how free and fair they may be. Real democracy must be more complex. We have introduced a process of tripartite negotiation which is of particular relevance. This process is already under way in Mozambique with the Government, employers and trade unions working together. The importance of this lies in stabilizing socio-economic life and expanding genuine democracy. We expect to submit the relevant Convention in this field for formal ratification before the end of the year.

Finally, I would like to reiterate my best wishes for this 81st Session of the Conference of the ILO.

Original Arabic: Mr. DERBI (Government delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – We congratulate the President on his election to the chair of this session and wish him every success. We also congratulate the people of South Africa on their liberation from the regime of apartheid, which has gone never to return, and on the establishment of a democratic State under the presidency of Mr. Nelson Mandela, winner of the Al-Qathafi Award for Human Rights.

I welcome the new member States of the ILO.

The Director-General's Report entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, which is an important source of information, raised a number of urgent questions relating to the present and future of the International Labour Organization in the modern world, which is undergoing radical changes in terms of relations among States and between States and their constituents, that is to say the social partners and in particular employers and workers.

In spite of the importance of the Report and the thought-provoking ideas and views it contains, there are two important observations that need to be made.

First, the collapse of the communist bloc does not means that the monitoring of the implementation of international labour standards, on which views at this Conference have clashed, is a thing of the past. We consider that some of the shortcomings of the monitoring system applied may still be criticized and should be remedied, regardless of the position of the former communist bloc.

Second, the Report is in favour of the market economy, viewing it as an internationally recognized standard of reference, and the planned economy is considered undesirable. This does not mean that the market economy is unassailable, since its laws give a free hand to multinational corporations and ignore the principles and foundations of social justice in the wide sense of the term, especially as regards the weaker sectors of societies. It is the law of the survival of the fittest, of those who determine the fate of others. On that account, the State must not be left out but must continue its role as the protector and guardian of social peace in order to ensure equality and a fair distribution of income in society.

The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. Since its inception, the Organization has achieved many of the aims set forth in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, which state that "... universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice, and ... conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled".

In the ILO we discuss and analyse social problems throughout the world and try to find appropriate ways to reduce unemployment, to combat poverty, to achieve full employment, to guarantee justice and social security and to maintain proper standards for the protection of the labour force. But these efforts are in danger of running aground in some countries because of circumstances beyond their control created, unfortunately, by international bodies such as the United Nations and the Security Council which have been controlled, since the upsetting of world balance, by States that have not yet rid themselves of certain traces of the colonialist mentality. They are now proceeding against us from a new direction, trying to gain absolute control over peoples' resources. Accordingly, the Security Council has adopted resolution imposing unjust and oppressive sanctions against certain countries that have had an adverse social impact on all sectors of the population and particularly on workers.

The sanctions imposed on the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya by unjust and oppressive resolutions have led to unemployment, a phenomenon that the country had not experienced for more than 20 years. On the contrary, it provided employment for thousands of workers from neighbouring and friendly countries because the graduates of our own education and training systems were not sufficient to meet the need for human resources under the economic and social development plan.

Implementation of the air embargo resolutions has put tens of thousands of employees of Libyan Airlines, engaged in various occupations, out of work. The freezing of assets had caused an economic recession and some development projects have been abandoned, leading to a reduction in job opportunities for workers. We have had difficulty in creating appropriate jobs for new graduates from the universities and vocational training institutes and centres. The air embargo, which has made it necessary to travel by land from the Jamahiriya to neighbouring countries in order to travel by plane from there, has led to a large number of road accidents: a total of 14,904, including 2,571 fatalities, 6,017 injuries leading to permanent disability and 7,343 injuries involving absence from work and productive activity for periods of varying length. Five hundred sick people, including 200 infants, who needed treatment abroad died during transport by land. On top of this, enterprises and factories are suffering from shortages of spare parts or materials and the agricultural sector has recorded a decline of 44 per cent, which is equivalent to $334 million.

These sanctions have caused enormous damage and have had far-reaching social repercussions on all citizens, employers and workers, women, old people and children. They are in flagrant violation of human rights, social justice and the principle of full employment. They also contravene the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. The people of Iraq have also been subjected to the same sanctions as a result of Security Council resolutions, although Iraq has done everything demanded of it and there is no longer any justification for maintaining these sanctions.

I believe that the moment has come for the ILO, by virtue of its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia – now that we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of its founding and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration – to make its voice heard, especially in international organizations such as the United Nations and the Security Council. It must take a courageous stand on all resolutions which have direct negative social repercussions on employment. It must call for an end to these resolutions and for the lifting of sanctions which are affecting all sectors of the population in the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. We must seek, by means of dialogue, to settle conflicts in a peaceful manner, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and international law, especially the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya has adopted an extremely flexible approach to try to find a solution to the crisis which has developed between it on the one hand and the United States and the Western countries on the other hand. This approach has been welcomed by the League of Arab States, the OAU, the non-aligned countries, the Islamic Conference and various trade union and peoples' organizations.

We call upon the ILO to continue its social role to ensure that all peoples may live freely and in conditions of dignity in a world where peace prevails.

May the peace of God, His mercy and grace go with you!

Mr. JENNINGS (representative, International Federation of Commercial, Clerical, Professional and Technical Employees) – It is a particular pleasure to speak today and to congratulate Chuck Gray on his election as President of the Conference. We are proud that colleague Gray was once the Assistant General-Secretary of FIET, the organization that I represent today. On behalf of our 11 million members, I wish him and the Conference well. It is also a privilege to be able to express a special word of appreciation about the presence at this Conference of the tripartite delegation of the new democratic South Africa. It has been a long road and it has been a victory for people everywhere. FIET is the International Trade Secretariat for the private services sector and our membership covers many crucial areas of the economy. We celebrate our 90th anniversary this year.

The ILO, as we know, is 75 years old this year. We believe that in the post-Cold War world, where the market is the overwhelming force in structuring our economies, the ILO is more relevant than ever.

Even a superficial look at the world around us shows that a successful economy can only be built on a foundation of cooperation, democracy and popular participation. Without the full support of workers and their families there cannot be sustainable economic development. The role of the ILO in promoting tripartism is essential, be it in established or newly industrialized countries, in developing countries, or in the economies in transition of Central and Eastern Europe and Asia.

Some of the most remarkable developments in the world of work have taken place in Central and Eastern Europe. New roads to freedom and democracy were opened for hundreds of millions of oppressed people. It was rightly expected that these developments would bring prosperity to working people and their families. Many of the expectations have failed to materialize and poverty and unemployment form a serious threat to stability in large parts of the region.

To create normal labour market relations in the countries in transition is a priority issue and the support of the ILO is needed. Governments and employers in the regions must abide by international labour standards. Workers and their unions must be fully consulted by governments and international institutions that participate in the restructuring process.

The situation of the world's developing countries has continued to deteriorate. Suffering from the burdens of the debt crisis and forced to initiate draconian structural adjustment measures, they lack the means to support their growing populations. Unemployment is rampant, social security and health care systems are unable to meet even the most basic needs and educational opportunities are declining as a price for a forced balancing of state budgets. The recent devaluation of their common currency, the CFA franc, has had a devastating impact on living standards in French-speaking Africa. Trade unions all over Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Caribbean can tell us what these developments translate to in the way of human suffering, despair and lack of hope for the future among the young generations.

It is time to be honest with each other and acknowledge that in many cases the free market, and especially deregulation, has failed us. Deregulatory experiments in some countries have been a disaster. We warn of the dangers of a collapse of the unregulated and uncontrolled financial derivatives market which will have repercussions on markets everywhere.

We must not decide at this Conference to completely deregulate temporary employment agencies, they require statutory supervision and licensing.

Where growth has been achieved the market has failed to deliver on social justice and income equity. It has failed to reduce unemployment and end discrimination. It has failed to reduce poverty and homelessness.

A recent study in the United Kingdom concluded that the "trickle down" effect, the cornerstone of free market policies, does not exist. After years of promises, the judgements on the market shows something which we have all feared. It is that the gap between the rich and the poor has not closed. This is a disgrace. We must act now to redress this disgrace. The ILO must play a decisive role in finding a new way.

FIET believes that the ILO can make a contribution and two recent events show this.

The first was the Tripartite Meeting on the Social Effects of Structural Change in Banking, held last year. This Meeting brought together for the very first time government, employer and trade union representatives from all over the world to discuss the massive changes occurring in this critical sector. We now have a social charter for the finance sector.

The second event I want to refer to is the recent Tenth Session of the ILO Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers. We managed to reach agreement on a set of conclusions which would do justice to any national tripartite discussion. They deal with issues which are central to all our futures: skills, training and retraining, employment creation, discrimination and problems posed by offshore processing, subcontracting and outsourcing.

Sectoral activities are at the heart of the ILO and they must continue and the Salaried Employees and Professional Workers' Committee must play a prominent role in them.

At that Committee we also discussed the question of labour standards and trade, one of the main subjects for debate at this Conference. For an issue of such great importance unfortunately a great deal of misinformation is clouding the discussions. We need some fresh oxygen in the debate.

It should be clearly stated that FIET is a strong supporter of free and fair trade, and international and economic cooperation. We can see the benefits of global economic development which creates the resources for improving social standards of workers all over the world. Our global economic destinies are intertwined, but we must not be blind to the risks inherent in a development which does not give full regard to the needs of the people.

Let me help you by saying what the social clause is not: it is not a protectionist clause designed to limit access to markets; it is not a protectionist clause trying to reintroduce tariffs and quota on export trade; it is not a way of trying to foist an international minimum wage on governments; it is not a way of trying to forcibly reduce the wage differential between countries.

So what is a social clause?

A social clause is concerned with basic human rights, which must be available to all workers in all countries and all continents. These rights are fundamental trade unions' rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining, freedom from forced labour, freedom from child labour and discrimination.

FIET believes that the best way for the living and working standards of workers to be raised is through the combination of international trade and cooperation and respect for trade union rights. Both must go hand in hand.

I put the question to this Conference. How are we going to get balanced and sustainable development if a country or a company builds a trade advantage by knowingly and deliberately denying these fundamental rights? Are not such abuses in themselves a form of protectionism?

So how should this delicate issue by handled? FIET has never suggested the setting up of any so-called trade court within the new World Trade Organization, with guillotine powers to immediately stop market access.

FIET believes that a social clause should be implemented using the structures and principles of the ILO, the checks and balances to which we have all already grown accustomed. These structures and principles have developed over many years, they are based on tripartism, transparency, consensus, proven expertise and enforcement, primarily through persuasion and dialogue.

It is high time that ILO and GATT leadership got together to prepare this matter to be ready by the time the WTO is established.

It is with these objectives of fairer trading conditions in mind that FIET is today launching its charter for clean competition. Today is the day when we seek to focus attention worldwide on what we call the invisible people: the cleaners, the security guards and caretakers and maintenance personnel who keep our buildings safe and clean to live and work in. These workers are often ignored, but without their vital services the quality of everyone's lives would be diminished. These workers are also some of the most exploited to be found anywhere. They suffer poverty, pay and poor working conditions, they pay the price of the emerging subcontract economy, being shifted from one worksite to another, one employer to another without any consideration of the hardship this brings to their lives. They are largely forgotten and rarely thanked. Many work for large multinational companies. We want governments, international organizations, employers and unions and workers to take notice of this charter and to take notice of the needs of these workers for justice.

I have given you just a glimpse of the concerns of our 11 million members in the new emerging global economy. I hope that you can see that the ILO has a crucial role to play as the world of work is transformed by technology and new forms of work organization emerge which go to the very root of the nature of employment. I look forward to the conclusions of this Conference and to an adoption of a Convention on part-time work, but above all, to agree a way forward to working out a mechanism to give a social dimension to trade.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.15 p.m.)

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. OULD SIDI) – The first item on the agenda is the adoption of the seventh report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 3F. If there are no objections I take it that it is adopted.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. OULD SIDI) – We will now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. EDSTRÖM (Workers' delegate, Sweden) – I wish to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to run the proceedings of this Conference.

As the Director-General states in his Report, tripartism must be reinforced everywhere. This basic principle of the ILO and the world of work, which helps to promote social justice and peace, also constitutes and essential element of a democratic society. The need to strengthen tripartite structures is quite obvious in both developing countries and countries in transition, but also in some developed countries.

I have at a previous session of the Conference expressed our worry over action taken by the Swedish Government to dismantle tripartite structures, a development that is also regretted by the Committee of Experts in its report to this Conference in view of the rapidly deteriorating situation concerning unemployment, a situation in which tripartite social dialogue is needed more than ever.

Other measures limiting the capacity of Swedish trade unions to defend the interests of their members have also been taken. Inherent in the principle of tripartism is a recognition of the need to assist the position of the social partners instead of undermining it. Actions like banning existing collective agreements or, a decision taken a week ago in Parliament, introducing unfair competition for our present union-run unemployment insurance system in the form of a cheaper State alternative subsidized by taxpayers covering all administrative costs, are intended to undermine the rate of unionization.

In his opening speech to the Conference, the Director-General stressed the need to choose important items for the agenda of International Labour Conferences and I fully agree. I therefore deplore the fact that the 259th Session of the Governing Body was unable to choose contract labour as a standard-setting item on the 1996 Session of the Conference as proposed by the Workers. This topic meets the criterion, often referred to by employers and governments, that ILO standards should reflect the changing world. This growing phenomenon in both developing and developed countries undermines the social protection of workers and calls into doubt the effective application of our jointly elaborated international labour standards. The comments made by the Committee of Experts on the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) also reveal the effects of subcontracting and child labour. In my view the spread of contract labour is not merely a challenge to the ILO; it is actually a threat.

In Sweden, the Co-determination Act has been changed, taking away the former right of trade unions to block unethical contractors with a poor record of not paying taxes or mandatory social contributions. In addition, a commission set up by the Government with the task of reviewing existing labour laws last spring has put forward ideas concerning contract labour according to which the decision on whether a person is to be treated as a worker (and thereby granted workers' rights) or not depends to some extent on his or her status with respect to the tax authorities. The danger of abuse is obvious because it will give unscrupulous employers an opportunity to make a vacant job conditional upon the willingness of the jobseeker concerned to register as self-employed, thereby losing his or her social protection.

One question of common concern to most of us here is how to secure the full observation in all countries of fundamental human rights in working life. The basic ILO Conventions regarding freedom of association and collective bargaining, forced labour, child labour and discrimination are widely ratified, almost all of them by over 100 member States. If these basic human rights were fully respected there would not be any need for a social clause. But the facts show that this is not the case. It seems that as long as it is economically profitable to exploit human beings, moral values concerning human dignity do not count. We are forced to introduce an economic incentive not to exploit human rights by introducing a social clause into international trade agreements.

A guiding principle in the history of the ILO is the universality of ILO minimum standards as well as the recognition that human rights can and should be granted independently of the level of economic development. But we still hear some governments argue, for instance in the Resolutions Committee, that if these basic human rights were recognized in international trade it would be an expression of protectionism. Perhaps a social clause could actually be beneficial even for these governments in their efforts to promote respect for basic human rights in working life.

When discussing the question of introducing a social clause, we have to remind ourselves of the notion in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution that, and I quote that "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries". The globalization of the economy proves the continuing validity of this notion today.

In the current debate on standard-setting activities, enough attention has not been paid to the need for all ILO member States to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The establishment of national tripartite procedures dealing with ILO matters would undoubtedly result in an increase in ratification of ILO Conventions and would probably also improve the situation with respect to failure to submit reports to the ILO or ILO instruments to national parliaments or even with respect to the number of violations of ratified Conventions. I hope that in this anniversary year, governments will give special attention to the prospects of ratifying this Convention No. 144.

We, as workers, are not opposed to revising ILO standards that have become obsolete. On the contrary, it is in our interest to have some ILO standards updated. Decisions have already been taken by the Governing Body on a regular revision of ILO standards. It is, however, necessary to establish mutual trust between the constituents of the ILO and it is essential that governments and employers clearly state that the purpose of revising standards is not to weaken the protection of workers or to abandon the basic aim of this Organization, which is to promote social justice and social progress.

Mr. TAN (Employers' delegate, Philippines) – On behalf of my colleagues may I extend our warmest congratulations to the President on his election and also to the Vice-Presidents, one of whom, Mr. Mendoza, is a dear countryman of ours whose election makes us justly proud. I am certain the President will direct this historic Conference with distinction and lead it to a successful conclusion.

We are celebrating this year the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization by, according to the Director-General, defending values and promoting change. It will be a time for remembrance and resolution as we recall the work of the ILO and judge for ourselves whether it has bridged the gap between the promise and the fulfilment of its mandate in the last 75 years.

Since the birth of the Organization in 1919, the world has changed dramatically. A few years ago, the collapse of Communism brought an end to the bipolar world. As a consequence, the confrontation of yesterday, even in this very hall, is giving way to consensus, and the dogmas of an earlier time are yielding to dialogue and discussion. We are realizing that the international rules of conduct we forged for ourselves were not written in bronze and they must be made to respond to the changing times.

Faced with the fundamental economic and political changes affecting the civilized world, the thought-provoking summons of the Director-General to review the role of the ILO is as compelling as it is provocative. We are called upon to look at how far the ILO has gone and how much it has done to achieve the ends of social justice. As envisioned in its mandate, this was to be secured not by coercion but by moral persuasion and certainly not by governments and workers alone but by employers as well.

In this context, the ideas brought forth in the Report deserve our serious consideration, especially the function of the ILO in standard setting and the values the Organization seeks to nurture through Conventions and Recommendations. We share the view that the ILO should soften the rigidity of its prescriptions if it wishes to gain wider acceptance of the norms of conduct it proposes to adopt for workers and employers. It should allow for flexibility in measuring the reasonableness of terms and conditions of employment commensurate to one's level of economic development.

In a sense, an organization as venerable as the ILO can become the victim of its own devices. Wizened by time, this great institution may wake up to the reality that it may have "exhausted" its capacity for social engineering. Yet the number of Conventions, Recommendations and other documents of transcendental importance do not necessarily reflect the collective virtues of mankind. It is not far-fetched to suppose that if all the Conventions and Recommendations were to be encapsulated in one parchment, how much simpler it would have been to adopt the beatitudes of ancient times.

We must then review not only the standards set by the Organization, but also the method of setting them. In the process, it is but fair to permit the critical concerns of fledgling economies to override the constraints of international standards. Poor nations and destitute peoples should not be condemned as violators of inflexible rules just because they cannot cope with the lifestyle of the rich and famous.

We need only to remind ourselves that the rate of ratification of Conventions has stagnated over the years. This should not surprise us. Rather, we must avoid the temptation of legislating for every conceivable activity in the world of work. If the instruments themselves, no matter how altruistic their purposes may be, become an obstacle to growth and prosperity, they do not deserve much of the value the more prosperous communities place upon them.

Good intentions alone cannot enhance the well-being of the workers. They must have jobs first to appreciate the comfort of social protection, the balm of occupational health and safety, and the rewards of honest toil shielded from the ravages of economic uncertainties.

Towards this end, the ILO should ride on the globalization of the economy. The shift to free enterprise in many areas of the world presents the constituents of the Organization with enough reason to shape it as an agent: to create jobs – not merely to protect existing ones; to promote entrepreneurship – not merely to train workers to support it; to facilitate the free flow of technology, goods, services and capital – not to stifle it with the weight of unenforceable standards.

As we approach a new phase in the life of the Organization, we must not forget that it exists to serve us, not we to serve it. Its relevance must be measured not by the code of rules it forges on the anvil of rhetoric, but by how much human dignity has been enhanced since the ILO was born three generations ago. On this score, the social partners may differ in their perception. But one thing is undisputed: the most vicious threat to the dignity of man is unemployment and it is a problem that both developing and industrialized countries are facing today.

In response to this threat, the social conscience of the ILO should be challenged to achieve the ideal of maximum employment. It must endeavour to accord every person the opportunity to obtain gainful work. It should induce the enterprises to open their gates to as many workers as can be absorbed by the demands of productivity and economies of scale. But even as it pursues all these, we should remind ourselves that there is no right to a job because the world owes no one a means of livelihood. The right to work, if such is to be recognized, simply means the right to offer one's services in a free labour market, not the right to be hired without conditions.

We should, therefore, appreciate the distinction between rights and opportunities. Over the years, the ILO has largely championed the cause of labour for reasons we all can accept, given the environment of sweatshops and exploitation of labour that assaulted the sensibilities of mankind at the time. We too remember these, even as we say that it is also the duty of the ILO to keep the establishment viable and profitable. The right to work, if it is to be meaningful, must likewise ensure the right of an entrepreneur to a fair return on his investment and to industrial peace.

To achieve this balance is, without doubt, the burden and the glory of this Organization. As it stands today at the crossroads of its existence, the ILO must look at the world not as a dilapidated factory but as a forbidding terrain crammed with the hopes and aspirations of jobless millions. It must prepare for this new challenge with renewed vision and vitality, unhampered by misplaced priorities and orthodoxies of the past, and guided only by the timeless Declaration of Philadelphia that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere". With this as its guiding light, our warm wishes go with it as it begins another chapter of a life well-lived in the service of humanity.

Mr. LAURIN (Employers' adviser, Sweden) – Change is the only certainty in today's enterprises and it should also be a key word – it partly is, I think, for this Conference. There are four general tendencies among companies that can be seen: focusing on the core activity of each company; decentralization and fewer levels of decision-making; higher demands for competence and continuous learning at work; a new view and a new attitude towards the advantages of scale in production.

I will not try to analyse these elements here, but it is quite evident that the combination of these tendencies will result in dramatic changes for the labour market – changes that are only beginning to emerge. This may be considered bad or good, but it is my firm belief that such changes are necessary conditions for productive employment to be maintained, and, even more, to increase, in the "old" industrialized countries.

A consequence of this development is that the traditional antagonism between work and capital is disappearing. The old Tayloristic view that workers are interchangeable cogs in the machinery, permanently subordinated to the employer, is clearly a thing of the past.

Today's workers are individuals, each with a unique competence. The enterprise must assemble an optimal combination of the competence as well as the number of workers it needs in order to be competitive. The relationship between these providers of competence and the employer cannot any longer be based on the almost family-like relation that has been a characteristic of contracts of employment in the past. The new relationship is one of equality, not of subordination with a need to protect the weaker party. The starting point is rather a contract of what is to be performed and what is to be delivered.

In many modern enterprises, particularly those with a high demand for knowledge such as technology, finance and the media, to mention but a few branches, there are already examples when today's very complex rules of the labour market hinder this necessary adaptation. It has become necessary to try to circumvent obsolete rules and create more suitable forms of contract. And these efforts are done on a basis of consensus between those who pay to get the work done and those who carry out the work and thus deliver the product paid for.

I have tried in this way to show that the distinction between an employer and a customer becomes less and less clear, and it must be possible and permitted for the contracting parties to arrange their relations also on other mutually acceptable terms than that of old-style employment relations. It is this win-win relationship between parties freely agreeing on a contract that is the characteristic of a well-functioning market.

The ILO could play an important part in this development towards more flexible ways of finding contracts and rules to fit the changing and more diverse needs of the workers-producers and the employers-customers that I have outlined here. But the Director-General's Report takes a different view of tomorrow's working life. New developments of the kind mentioned are only described in terms of risks and threats instead of as a challenge and inspiration to find new and more flexible solutions.

In particular, the ILO standard-setting machinery today is not very helpful and rather counterproductive. One reason for that is that the ILO system of rules is based on an obsolete view of the employer-employee relationship. This is something many industrial countries learn with dismay, when they try to change their national systems and rules to be better adapted to today's problems and find that their hands are tied by ILO Conventions, often made and ratified several decades ago, in a completely different context.

Ideas in this Report, and elsewhere, to go one step further and use these Conventions for social clauses in trade make them even more worrying. Such a course of action would in all probability complicate the standard-setting machinery even further, if not downright paralyse it. In my view, free trade is the only viable way to achieve increased and more evenly spread wealth.

There is a very evident need for fundamental reforms of the ILO, as has been spelled out, together with concrete proposals for such changes by the International Organization of Employers (IOE). These proposals have been made in a spirit of cooperation and stem from a genuine concern and wish to secure that the ILO is a relevant organization both today and tomorrow. Each separate proposal may seem rather modest, but put together, they might however be the very first step to make the ILO a valuable and credible actor in relation to all three parties that are its customers.

But I fear I see little of these proposals in the Director-General's Report. I have had the privilege to be able to spell out my own proposals and thoughts for the future more in detail than the Director-General, in view of the 75 years jubilee, in the anthology called Visions of the future of social justice. In that article I make a plea for an ILO that is relevant and useful for all three constituents. The ILO must especially become more useful to the employers if their interest in contributing ideas and resources is to be upheld also in the future. Not least my own organization's past record prove our genuine will to do so, provided that we see the relevance and usefulness to our member companies.

I shall not repeat all my arguments here, they can be read in the article. But under the heading "A new business plan for the ILO", from my background in the packing business, I summarize what I think is needed for the ILO in order to regain its credibility and play a constructive role in the future in the following way. The ILO activities should: be demand drive, not supply drive; capitalize on member experience in order to become a data bank for labour market issues; emphasize support, technical cooperation and education; and last but not least, scrutinize its Convention maze, refrain from detailed Conventions and analyse existing Conventions for deregulation and updating.

To conclude, let me go back to the beginning of this intervention and underline that to an enterprise, it is of vital importance to adapt itself constantly to new and changing circumstances and a changing world situation. Those who ignore what the customer wants to buy do not survive. Also, the public services in many countries now try to orient themselves more toward what is perceived as customer needs. What would be more natural than if the ILO were also to take this same attitude, for instance, when considering new Conventions. Only by having Conventions which can and will be ratified by a great majority of the member States can the ILO standard-setting activity be considered to be customer-oriented.

It is my firm hope that the Director-General will not only listen to the proposals put forward in this debate, but also implement them. If he does, he could be directing an organization well equipped to assume the new challenges that we are going to face in the working life of tomorrow.

Original Spanish: Mrs. VILCHES ARRIBAS (Workers' delegate, Spain) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President on his election, which no doubt will benefit the developments which will take place at this session of the Conference.

The celebration of the 75th anniversary of the Organization in itself justifies an examination of the role played by the ILO in the world and an analysis of future perspectives. The profound changes which have taken place and which are taking place in the world now and over the last few years not only justify but demand that there be an examination and assessment of what has happened and, particularly, that we draw up a programme for the future. The Report of the Director-General is the first contribution to that task and I think it places the debate in the proper context.

Trying to identify these transformations immersing us reveals the fact that we agree with the Director-General in the way he characterizes the situation: disappearance of the communist bloc, globalization of the economy and the exacerbation of social problems. Together with these issues that characterize this moment in history, we can see that now although the polarization of the East and the West has disappeared, there still is a deep chasm dividing the rich North from the poor South. Although the composition of the working class is undergoing constant transformation, workers continue to have specific interests whose defence is entrusted to trade union representatives. We see in a number of countries the shortsighted claims made by a certain number of ideologists wishing to weaken or even to eliminate the trade unions. This is a very dangerous position particularly for those sorcerers' apprentices who make these claims, because they would have to bear the obvious repercussions resulting from an absence of trade unions. The workers will always defend their interests and will always find ways and means to do so.

Common sense tells us that the greater the degree of globalization of the economy, the greater is the importance of international organizations such as the ILO particularly at a time when social inequalities are growing.

As regards the standards of the ILO, we are continually faced with the following alternative: either the provisions are made more flexible so that they can be adopted by the majority of member States, in which case the Conventions would lost their efficiency; or they keep their content and remain strict obligations, in which case there is the risk of ratification by a smaller number of countries. This alternative is not as real as it might appear at first sight. It suffices to glance at the records of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards to see that a failure to ratify an instrument is often the result of a lack of means to fulfil the provisions implied by ratification, which makes technical cooperation particularly important or, in simple terms, there are a few significant examples of where Conventions are not ratified so that States can avoid having to be investigated.

We are not in favour of eroding the substance of the standards of the ILO. This would presuppose a reduction of the role played by this Organization and would lead us to call into question its very existence. And what would be worse would be that it would lead to a drastic reduction of the rights of the working population.

There is a certain sector calling for greater flexibility and deregulation in sacred areas such as competitivity, bowing down to modernity and sacrificing everything to it. One has the impression sometimes that one could apply in certain cases what the muse of history said to the Spanish people at the end of the nineteenth century, in the words of Pérez Galdós:

"Your governors are creators of myths, and showing them to the people, they walk blindly without knowing what they want or where they are going".

In Spain, both the Government and the employers have embraced with a faith worthy of a greater cause the old myths of deregulation, flexibility and competitivity, and on the altar they have sacrificed realities such as stability in employment for the most vulnerable groups, namely women and children, facilitated the dismissal of older workers and the majority of workers, both men and women, are seeing their rights eroded.

On 23 May 1991 a reform of social legislation in Spain was published which encourages and makes it cheaper to dismiss workers with fixed-term contracts, and extends the grounds for dismissal and debases employment based on "worthless contracts". This means that very often the workers with this kind of contract lost their entitlement to unemployment benefit, and cover for sickness, occupational accidents and retirement. The new regulations covering collective bargaining favour the employers at the expense of the workers, thus abandoning the necessary impartiality and balance.

This reform was not only not negotiated with the trade unions, but only became known to us when the Government, as legally required, submitted it to the Economic and Social Council. Against these measures the working population of Spain held a massive general strike on 27 January, 1994.

All this is taking place in a country such as Spain, where as in the past, the most important and relevant piece of information is how far fixed employment is being destroyed – almost 600,000 fixed-term jobs have been lost since the third quarter of 1992. In the first quarter of 1994 a further 60,000 jobs whose length was not determined have been cut.

At present there are 3,792,800 persons unemployed, corresponding to 24.6 per cent of the population, with women with ten points difference from men at the forefront of unemployment. We continue to hold the record for having double the average unemployment in the European Union.

The seriousness of these figures is not only a question of numbers (a quarter of the economically active population is unemployed) but of time. More than 1,900,000 people have been unemployed for more than one year, and no less than 1,400,000 people have been unemployed for two years. Moreover, there has been a reduction as regards the intensity, scope and duration of protection for the unemployed, which is leading to a reduction in the number of persons who are able to benefit from social protection. Very probably we shall shortly see further erosion of the levels of protection. This analysis cannot be separated and divorced from the situation of many women who in the face of social changes have dependent children, and often little money to live on.

Returning now to the Report of the Director-General, we have stated that we are opposed to deregulation, for the same reasons why our civilization rejects the law of the jungle, and survival of the fittest. We agree that flexibility is necessary as regards the adaptation to standards to social reality. This adaptation or flexibility is so necessary that we do not believe that anyone would oppose it. The question is not whether or not we should have flexibility, but how we can be flexible and to what end. We agree with democratically exercised flexibility, with the participation of all workers, and which prevents enforced adaptation.

In this respect, the ILO has excellent methods of work which are its very essence, and distinguish it from other international organizations. We are referring here particularly to tripartism, which is a guarantee of democracy and efficiency in so far as the foundations of social justice can be laid only if the social actors themselves are involved in finding solutions.

Flexibility should be included as one of the subjects of discussion, and studied in the ILO, and here we would endorse prior discussions at the Conference with a view to identifying the real needs.

As regards the important issue of the social clause in the world markets, we are continuing to support the concept of free trade, and oppose protectionism, but we are also opposed to social dumping, because of the marginalization, deregulation and exploitation it leads to.

We feel that a mere declaration and programme of action adopted on the basis of consensus in the Governing Body of the ILO, would have many inherent limitations. We would, however, be in favour of an international labour Convention which would include incentives for ratification as suggested by the Director-General.

Finally, we would like to express our satisfaction and pleasure at two recent historic events, namely the ending of apartheid in South Africa heralded by the recent elections and the signing of agreements on Gaza and Jericho which we are convinced will help bring about lasting peace in the Middle East. These are important events, but nevertheless do not divest our attention from other issues in the world where there is tremendous suffering of the civilian population, as in the case of Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, and the new shoots and signs of racism and intolerance at present springing up in parts of Europe.

Original Portuguese: Mr. VAN ZELLER (Employers' delegate, Portugal) – First of all, I would like to express my congratulations to the Chairman on his election.

The Report presented by the Director-General at this session of the International Labour Conference concentrates on a series of questions which, in the international context, are indisputably of definite importance. Nevertheless, my statement will deal solely with three issues I consider to be of especial importance.

The first of these questions relates to social justice in the present economic and social context.

Globalization of the economy – a phenomenon which is progressing rapidly, and which the Director-General refers to on pages 12 to 15 of the English version of his Report, raises a set of economic problems which obviously have social repercussions.

It is true that, as the Director-General says, "The liberalization of international trade and capital movements certainly offers reasonable possibilities of worldwide growth, employment creation and poverty alleviation. But there is no guarantee that greater social justice will automatically result from it".

Promoting and developing social justice is one of the ILO's primary objectives, its very raison d'être, to use the expression employed by the Director-General in his Report.

In this respect, it is important to emphasize that economic actors in countries with well-developed social protection systems see with concern that many other countries with considerable economic growth rates do not offer their citizens social protection schemes which would be considered satisfactory in global comparisons.

It is therefore our opinion that the ILO should take action to heighten awareness and convince member States about questions raised by these problems.

In this context, the rigorous supervision of the application of international legal instruments is of particular importance.

Indeed, non-implementation of Conventions ratified by member States and, in general, the non-respect of voluntarily accepted standards – a phenomenon all the more undesirable by its common occurrence – are clearly unacceptable and consequently call for reintensified monitoring.

In parallel, and linked with this aspect, I would like to express my concern that, for some years now, the number of Convention ratifications has stagnated. I would also like to state how worried I am that some of the latest Conventions have received very few ratifications at all.

And this leads me to my second question.

This low ratification rate phenomenon is, in my opinion, attributable basically to the texts being too inflexible, detailed and over-demanding.

In the current world crisis, the necessary restructuring and boosting of the economy call for great flexibility. ILO's standards creation efforts should therefore be made bearing this in mind.

I must add that the influence of certain States, including certain European ones, can be highly negative in this respect, when they demand that Conventions and Recommendations contain requirements which may be overly demanding for the less-developed countries, and thus render these instruments impossible to ratify or create a situation in which ratification is followed by non-implementation.

For ethical reasons, at least, these countries should ratify the instruments in question.

I believe it is urgent to prepare a global programme of instrument revision to adapt standards to new economic and social realities and make them more flexible.

Moreover, current practice by which two ratifications are sufficient for an instrument to enter into force, should be modified realistically. The number of required ratifications should be raised as a guarantee that the instrument is reasonable and necessary.

In this context, I would also like to express a point of view which, I think, is shared by employers in general. We should employ Recommendations as autonomous instruments with their own aims and ends rather than as mere back-ups to a Convention, as is currently the case.

I would now like to turn to a question raised by the Director-General in his Report, on the matter of international trade and the social clauses.

In our rapidly and consistently globalizing economy, this problem is a very acute one. The truth is that, as a result of progressive international trade liberalization, certain countries – and I think this is beyond question – which do not abide by certain minimum social conditions, win for themselves a quite considerable economic advantage.

It can, no doubt, be considered that such situations translate into unfair competition. And it is for just this reason that discussion of this issue is increasingly returning to the fore.

Nevertheless, in our view, the ILO cannot play a standard-setting role in this sphere.

The ILO has neither the mission nor the competence to intervene in international trade.

Moreover, its approach is based on the fundamental voluntary nature of the obligations assumed by member States.

For this reason, it would be preferable to leave the problem to bodies responsible for international trade.

In any event, dissemination and enhancement of multilateral trade systems are certainly the best way to encourage economic growth in the less-developed countries.

These are three of today's most acute social and economic questions and ones which are a source of concern to my country's employers.

Mr. HAMEED (Government delegate, Pakistan) – May I begin by congratulating Mr. Gray on his election as President of this august assembly. I am confident that under his able leadership the deliberations of this Conference would be highly successful. I would also like to extend felicitations to the Vice-Presidents and other Officers of the Conference on their election.

This year the International Labour Conference reminds us of two important events in the history of mankind, the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. During the last 75 years the International Labour Organization has made great strides ahead. Its role in promoting social justice by way of protecting the rights of workers has been most commendable. While we all feel proud of making progress towards achieving the goals that we have set for ourselves, our success must not become a source of complacency. What is needed today is for us to take stock of our achievements and failures, and plan for the future.

The Director-General's Report, which brings to us an in-depth review of our efforts towards achieving our cherished goals, and which reminds us of the principles of the ILO, is an important one. We commend the efforts made in the preparation of this Report and congratulate the Director-General and his staff.

Since the time of the creation of the International Labour Organization there have been enormous changes in the world. The rapid pace of industrialization, the ever-increasing gap between the rich and the poor, and social injustice, both at national and international levels, have created a new global atmosphere. Time has shown that our response to the new situations has been inadequate. Often, there has been a tendency to drift away from our objectives in consideration of political and other interests.

The basic philosophy of the ILO has always been to work as an apolitical organization, propagating respect for all human beings born free and equal, both in dignity and in rights; respect for human labour being the cornerstone of its ideology. These noble ideals are achieved through persuasion on moral grounds and on the basis of consensus. We feel that this is the best method for fulfilling our aims. To change these fundamentals would, in our view, be tantamount to degenerating the ILO's noble cause to mundane levels.

In recent years there has been a wide-scale campaign by certain countries to establish linkages between ILO standards and trade. The creation of such linkages can only further protectionist tendencies. That aside, we feel that the use of trade as a way of securing compliance with labour standards would in effect be counterproductive to the objective of promoting social justice as it would impede the process of growth and development, and hence social change. Equally, proposals to divide ILO standards into so-called core and non-core standards will destroy the unity and integrity of these standards. In our opinion, this policy would ultimately be detrimental to the cause of workers all around the globe, especially in the developing countries.

The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan provides guarantees of the fundamental rights of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice. Commitment to these objectives attempts to attain nationally and internationally the goals of human well-being and collective prosperity with justice for all. With these goals and principles, Pakistan shares its role and character with the ILO. Pakistan will remain firm in its convictions to observe internationally recognized workers' rights, through progressive legislative actions and the setting up of an institutional administration.

In this regard, I would like to draw your attention to the manifesto of the Government of Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto, which lays emphasis on taking measures to protect workers' rights in the light of ILO policies. To redeem its pledge, the Government is determined to take steps with far-reaching consequences, and has systematically taken in hand the gigantic task of restructuring labour legislation. Two task forces were constituted for this purpose. The first task force, which was mandated to study the evolution of a progressive scheme of social security and welfare measures, has already submitted its report. The other task force, which was mandated to examine a wide range of subjects concerning workers' rights, is also expected to complete its work shortly. The collective objective of both these task forces is to propose progressive measures for a balanced industrial relations system with further protection for workers, so as to enable Pakistan to meet the objective of its constitutional commitment.

Over the last few years, Pakistan has been subjected to tirades on account of child labour. We in Pakistan would like the critics to adopt a more rational approach on this issue. The problem of child labour needs to be correctly understood in the context of the socio-economic environment of the country. For those who wish to understand, the reasons are very simple. In a household living in abject poverty, the parents can hardly provide food for their children. Often, if not involved in productive and constructive activities, these children become victims of adolescent delinquencies. We feel that child labour can only be eradicated completely if the people are given a decent lifestyle. This can only come through sustained economic growth.

For its part, the Government of Pakistan is committed to take every possible step to eliminate this problem from the country. Progressive laws have been enacted in this regard and efforts are also being made to strengthen the implementation mechanism of these laws. I would also like to inform the Conference that Pakistan has decided to sign a Memorandum of Understanding with the ILO to launch a comprehensive programme for the gradual elimination of child labour.

While continuing with our commitment for the betterment of our masses, which is in conformity with the ideology of the ILO, I have pleasure in informing the Conference that the Government of Pakistan has decided to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159).

To mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia a commemorative stamp has also been issued.

At a time when we are reaffirming our commitment to protect the rights of workers, irrespective of any other considerations, we must include in our future agenda the importance of helping those who are in desperate need of our support. I am referring here to the workers in the occupied and disputed territories around the world. In the past, my delegation has brought to the knowledge of the Conference the situation of workers in Indian occupied Kashmir where the civil, political, social, cultural and economic rights of workers are being massively violated. Forced displacement of labour, in contravention of ILO Conventions, and arbitrary arrest and torture have seriously hampered the economic conditions of workers in Indian occupied Kashmir. This is being done under the spurious argument of cross-border terrorism, while at the same time refusing international monitoring or fact-finding.

Instances of gross violation of human rights continue to occur also in other parts of the world, specifically in Bosnia and the occupied Arab territories. The acts of barbarism perpetuated upon the people of Bosnia, including a large majority of its workforce, are shameful. The ILO also should and must raise its voice on the atrocities committed against the workers of this population.

In conclusion, I would like to reiterate Pakistan's total support of the fundamental right of peoples to self-determination and urge the international community to take immediate steps to protect their basic human rights.

Original Japanese: Mr. ITOH (Workers' delegate, Japan) – It is a great honour for me and for the Japanese Trade Union Confederation to participate in this discussion. I would like to extend my wholehearted congratulations to Brother Charles Gray on his election to the presidency of the Conference.

This session of the Conference is a very important one, coinciding as it does with the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Director-General has submitted to this anniversary Conference a Report on Defending values, promoting change. I would like to pay tribute to the Director-General for his Report.

I would like to raise two points as my contribution to the discussion on the Director-General's Report.

The first point is about tripartism. Tripartism is the most important characteristic of the ILO. If its potential is used to the full, the ILO will certainly contribute to eradicating poverty in the world and promoting human and trade union rights for workers. The Director-General insisted on the need to strengthen the influence of the ILO among the United Nations family and he pointed out that the best way to strengthen that influence is to make others understand that tripartism is not only an indispensable element of democracy but also the most effective means of responding to the drastic changes taking place in the world. I quite agree with him.

In this connection, I would like to point out that the discussions at recent sessions of the Governing and the International Labour Conference, have revealed a tendency for each of the tripartite constituents to insist on its own position, thus making it difficult to arrive at fruitful results for workers, a tendency about which the Director-General has expressed some concern.

For example, with regard to the adoption of international labour standards, which is a very important ILO role, workers argued for the adoption of new Conventions, while governments and employers argued that the promotion and revision of existing Conventions are a more effective way if attaining the objectives of the ILO. As a result, a new technical item for the 1995 Session of the International Labour Conference was not selected.

As a Workers' delegate, I think that the workers' side should also be ready to listen to the arguments of employers and governments and vice versa, since the most important thing is to achieve the objectives of the ILO step by step, through tripartite discussion.

To achieve this, I think it is important for the Director-General to improve the capacity and quality of the International Labour Office and to give good advice to the Governing Body. On the other hand, all the representatives of the tripartite constituents should fully respect the importance of tripartism, which is a unique characteristic of the ILO.

We must always bear in mind that democracy guarantees freedom of speech, but true democracy should make possible a positive consensus through discussion. Governments, workers, employers and the International Labour Office should be fully aware of their roles and execute their own tasks with a full sense of duty and responsibility.

The second problem I would like to discuss is about employment creation. The Director-General expressed very serious concern about this issue. I am also aware of how difficult it is to create high quality employment under present world circumstances amid the turmoil of structural changes.

In order to create employment, I think there are three tasks that the ILO should address. The first would involve making a strong request to the World Bank, the IMF and other similar institutions not to apply stereotyped financial and budgetary policies to all developing and least developed countries. A clear message should be addressed to these institutions that drastic change does not lead to economic growth with employment creation. On the contrary, it introduces confusion into the economy of a country with a negative effect on employment.

The second issue is related to double standards, which are being widely discussed within the ILO. Fair competition in world trade means that all countries should apply ILO standards related to the social clause.

But there are many least developed countries unable to find a way to develop and many developing countries experiencing difficulties. The application of the same working conditions to workers in both developing and industrialized countries is not conducive to development and welfare in developing countries. For least developed and developing countries the most important priority should be guaranteeing employment for workers and people in general. Thereafter the problem is one of guaranteeing good quality employment. In order to improve the quality of employment, it is necessary to improve productivity, and employers should not monopolize the benefit of higher productivity but fairly distribute it among workers. And the government should endeavour, in close cooperation with employers and workers, to achieve gradual improvements in the social clause.

I would like to say a few words here in the light of our experience in Japan. We believe that enterprises, before laying off employees, should make serious efforts, involving close consultation between management and unions, to retrain employees and redeploy them within the enterprise in order to maintain the current level of employment. The government and trade unions should strongly support these efforts of enterprises. We must establish a social awareness that the dismissal of workers is an expression of the failure and incompetence of management and a disgrace for the enterprise. When enterprises are obliged to dismiss employees, they should make a serious effort to find jobs for the dismissed workers.

I am against double standards. Trade unions in industrialized countries should understand the importance of employment creation and improvement of the quality of employment in developing countries, and this can be achieved only through gradual efforts on our part. The improvement of productivity is a necessary and sufficient precondition for the creation and improvement of the quality of employment.

Another crucial issue is how to create a situation in which trade unions can negotiate a fair distribution of the benefits achieved through higher productivity on a equal footing with employers and governments. In order to create this situation, I fully support incorporation of the social clause in a World Trade Organization agreement.

The third task is development of the ILO's technical cooperation, a field in which there are many areas of and in which our efforts need to be upgraded. I should like to mention in this connection the importance of educational activities.

I think that the ILO should fully execute its mandates in these three areas.

Finally, I would like to join others in celebrating, from the bottom of my heart, the birth of the democratic Government in South Africa. I would like to congratulate the ILO on the important role it has played to this end, and I hope that the ILO makes further efforts to promote a final solution of the Israeli and Palestinian issue.

(Mr. Mendoza takes the Chair.)

Mr. MALLIA-MILANES (Employers' delegate, Malta) – On behalf of my Employers' delegation, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to steer the deliberations of this Conference.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General for the excellent Report, marking the 75th anniversary of the ILO, which he has presented to the Conference. The Report takes stock of what our Organization has done over the 75 years of its existence and the world of work, and places its achievement as a solid foundation on which to construct appropriate responses to the challenges of a changing world.

Rightly so, for the Director-General believes that the social justice remains central to the ILO's raison d'être. Over the years the ILO has contributed significantly to world peace by promoting social justice, and its tripartite structure has stood the test of time in promoting a continuous dialogue and cooperation with member States and with employers' and workers' organizations. The world has realized that effective and lasting solutions can best be achieved through dialogue and not through confrontation and social divisions.

Celebrating a 75th anniversary can be an achievement in more ways than one; but to my mind the most positive aspect of this celebration is that our Organization is well equipped and oriented to tackle future challenges as they arise.

For instance, the globalization of the economy has highlighted the link between free trade, as exemplified in the Marrakesh agreement on GATT, and international labour standards. To what extent is it still feasible to establish regulatory machinery at international level without discriminating against those countries which, owing to their lack of development, are unable to subscribe to labour standards taken for granted in developed States? There is no doubt that the link between international labour standards and trade practices has never been so relevant as it is today. The integration of national economies into a global system has made differences and inequalities more apparent.

The Director-General casts light on several inequalities that unfortunately exist between States and within States. New forms of poverty in the industrialized countries are creating social marginalization. Past hopes of promoting economic development of the Third World and reducing inequalities have, with some notable exceptions, been disappointed.

Employers have for long been insisting that meeting the demand for employment deserves fundamental priority. The Director-General refers to it as among the values of the ILO, but for us employers it is the practical approach to the employment challenge that is important. We must promote a business-friendly environment which favours the creation of productive employment. Only an economy in which such conditions exist and are actively fostered can the fight against poverty and social exclusion make tangible headway. Experience has shown that the free market is the only system which guarantees this objective in the long term. In this context, my delegation notes with regret that the Report of the Director-General omits any reference to the values of the enterprise. These values constitute the basic philosophy of one of the three partners making up the ILO. Tripartism implies taking into full account the values of each of the three parties involved in such dialogue. The role of private enterprise deserved a prominent place in the Director-General's Report. Any omission to this can only undermine a constructive debate on future challenges.

It comes as no surprise that emphasis is placed on the question of standards in the Report. The Director-General shares the employers' concern that Conventions are being increasingly less ratified and applied. Perhaps the time has come to look into this disquieting situation deeply and objectively. Is it wise today to devote so much time and other resources on continuing to build up an increasingly voluminous labour code? Should we not be concentrating rather on the revision and wider application of existing standards? In most countries the trend is towards less regulation in order to leave more room for individual initiative and for negotiation. It is increasingly acknowledged that national standards must concentrate on what is essential and not get bogged down in unnecessary detail. This is even more true of instruments intended for international application.

Those ILO Conventions, and they are not few, which only enjoy limited ratification should be examined afresh, in the light of difficulties actually encountered, with a view to providing greater flexibility and making them more acceptable to more member States.

Excessive regulation is increasingly seen as a brake on economic development and, as a consequence, on social progress.

To my mind standards should be drafted in such a way that they can be ratified and applied by all member States. A comprehensive study should be carried out allowing for global reform. We should also look into the possibility of separating Conventions from Recommendations. The two do not necessarily have to go together. Each of them has its own merits if adopted separately.

We cannot continue drawing up more and more Conventions when the new world order requires of us that we fight poverty by means of a balanced increase in national wealth and the development of productive employment. To attain this we need to have a climate of freedom and flexibility that promotes the entrepreneurial spirit, the market economy and the development of human resources.

We, as employers, would like to see: a clear and accurate definition of the ILO's priorities and fundamental objectives; a re-evaluation of the ILO's means of action; a new orientation for the role of the Governing Body in determining policy; a reform of its decision-making and regional structures; and a policy to promote the ILO's image.

For instance, the Report refers to the establishment of multidisciplinary teams in the different regions and the strengthening of area offices. This is a positive approach. But questions have been raised regarding the possible negative effect of such decentralization on the quality of remaining services available from headquarters. This is especially important for those developing countries, like mine, which do not have an area office and which belong to a region (in our case Europe) whose level of development is such as to preclude regional assistance projects from which we can benefit. Consequently, our only avenue for technical assistance appears to be directly from headquarters. On the other hand, it should not prove impossible for the geographical zones covered by the proposed multidisciplinary teams to be flexible enough so as to provide for our requirements.

Government and Workers' representatives should give serious consideration to these proposals and we look forward to their own contributions to this debate.

We believe the time is ripe for the Conference to provide the framework for a serious debate on these issues. The world is relying on us to give the International Labour Organization a new sense of purpose and mission on its 75th anniversary.

Original Spanish: Mr. LUNA-ROJAS (Workers' delegate, Peru) – This year when we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, the Peruvian workers would like to make an appeal to the ILO that it devote itself with greater impetus and dynamism to its task of protecting and promoting the rights and conditions of work of workers throughout the world.

At this time social justice continues to be a primary demand, particularly in developing countries and those where totalitarianism and the absence of democracy are still a fact.

For this reason we must avoid the weakening of the ILO at all costs. On the contrary, we would like to see a strengthening and extension of its influence and activities in order to contribute to creating a world in which we are able to eradicate poverty, expand protection granted to workers and create the necessary jobs for millions of unemployed and underemployed workers. Without a doubt the ILO, which personifies the ideal of social justice, can help us in a significant manner in achieving these aims.

The lack of implementation of international Conventions by the Peruvian Government has been noted by the various supervisory bodies of the ILO. This can be seen in the statement of the Committee on Freedom of Association in November 1993, which was adopted by the Governing Body, and the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which was submitted to this International Labour Conference.

Indeed, we find ourselves in the regrettable position of being obliged to denounce the main aspects of the anti-labour policy which the present Peruvian Government is applying against workers in my country. We wish to call attention to the fact that the majority of these measures have been handed down during the Government of President Fujimori, which dissolved the Congress of the Republic, with intervention by the judiciary, and the Court of Constitutional Guarantees was closed.

Taking advantage of this murky situation, Peruvian employers joined together to form a "tripartite" body – the Government, the army and the entrepreneurs – in order to introduce modifications to the Peruvian Constitution and laws with a view to creating greater "flexibility" of the labour market. Thus have the constitutional status of ILO standards and the main international human rights agreements been annulled.

No. 25593 was consequently passed, which introduced a series of obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights: the need to have a large number of members before a trade union can be created; the possibility of administratively dismantling trade unions, making it difficult to unionize workers who are undergoing a trial period, one year of seniority required in order to be an executive, and the prohibition of trade unions from participating in political matters. This decree also undermines the right to free and collective bargaining by making it necessary every year to "review" every collective agreement existing in 1992. In addition, for the first time in Peru the "expirationäof collective agreements after one year in force has been established, tantamount to the elimination of all rights under the agreements. This means that all the benefits stemming from the agreements must now be renegotiated every year for them to remain in force. Nevertheless, if workers opt to strike, this law enables the Government to hand down a resolution ordering a halt to the strike, that workers return immediately to their jobs, and that the trade union petition be settled by the Ministry of Labour. In addition, decisions must be taken by a simple majority of workers, including those who are unionized.

Elsewhere, Legislative Decree No. 728 has established the "expiry" after 30 days of any wage claims, or any claims for non-compliance with legal or agreement standards. This means that if a worker has not received his wages for April and does not submit a written demand by the end of May, then in June he can make no claim for payment.

Moreover, Legislative Decree No. 25921 gives employers the unrestricted right to modify substantially the work schedule, shifts, days and hours of work, and to modify, suspend or substitute financial benefits and conditions of work and to suspend labour negotiations temporarily. There is a procedure for this standard whereby the employer presents a request to the Ministry of Labour, which is automatically approved if the Ministry does not rule on the matter within two weeks.

Legislative Decree No. 728 among other negative aspects, has established the so-called "dismissal for operational necessity" by which five per cent of personnel may be dismissed annually and replaced by others. This is leading to the dismissal of dozens of trade union leaders since they have no special protection despite the position they may hold.

The Government has also created a system of private pensions and administrators of private pension funds, after implementing a policy intended to destroy the system of pensions administered by the Peruvian Social Security Institute, leaving hundreds of thousands of pensioners empty-handed, paying them pensions of around US$40 per month at best. Thus the worst swindle in our history has been perpetrated whereby after persons have had contributions regularly withheld for the pension funds all their life, they retire and find that the rules have been changed, they have been dropped by social security and the State is now responsible for paying their meagre pensions. There are no guarantees nor regulatory standards. A Provisional Standardization Bureau has been created, though there is no tripartite representation, which is to be administered by the State.

On the other hand, Legislative Decree No. 26279 created a committee for drafting a general law on labour and labour procedures within a period of 90 days. This period expired in April without a single article having been adopted. Here is evidence of the Government's lack of political will to have the committee carry out its duties. Instead, it is nothing but a ploy to fool ILO supervisory bodies by informing them that laws are being revamped with participation by workers.

Peruvian trade union organizations have been taking part in committee activities because we do have the right to make certain proposals and to agree with decisions; however, we wish to inform this Conference that we are withdrawing since the Government has shown that it has no interest in reforming labour legislation. This situation does not bode well for Peruvian workers if we comply with the letter of intent signed with the International Monetary Fund this year, which involves a commitment to render labour legislation even more flexible.

The serious violations of the freedom to organize, the right to strike and to collective bargaining which are being experienced by the workers of Peru have been duly noted by the ILO's supervisory bodies. They highlight the importance and the necessity of having international organizations such as the ILO and its tripartite backing.

For these reasons, we, the workers of Peru, express our opposition to the proposal made by the Director-General to reduce the role and influence of the ILO. On the contrary, we believe that every effort should be made to seek new forms of supervision to ensure the effective application of Conventions.

And finally, we, the workers of Peru who are members of the Office of Coordination for Peruvian Trade Union Organizations, believe that the ILO should not shirk its role and responsibility to participate in and support the GATT social clause, because the competence of the ILO in drawing up and supervising the application of International Labour Standards obliges it to participate in creating a social clause. If it were not to do so, it would be showing disregard for the fundamental principles of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Ms. AERENLUND (Workers' delegate, Denmark) – Let me start by expressing my satisfaction that, at this session of the Conference, Denmark is represented by female delegates both from the Government and from the employers' and workers' side. I hope that others have noticed this also, and that next year we may well be able to see more happy colours among all the grey, or in other words, the delegations will have a larger representation by the many competent women in the organizations and governments.

Let me thereafter go on to the Director-General's Report, thanking him for the many proposals he has tabled for debate, of which a number can be supported by my organization, whereas there are others which we would prefer not to have realised, for example the soft law approach. In the following I will primarily take up the ILO's role on the international stage in relation to the World Bank, the IMF, GATT/WTO and the Social Summit in Copenhagen.

The common basis for our discussion is the information contained in the Report of the Director-General, where the harsh realities of the world are illustrated by mass unemployment and abject poverty. Almost a third – i.e. 900 million people – of the world's population potentially able to work are either unemployed or underemployed. And since poverty is closely linked to unemployment, the number of people living below the poverty line has increased dramatically in recent years. At the global level we are talking of more than 50 per cent of the world's population.

A social bomb is ticking under the world society and this bomb must be defused before it explodes.

But we do have the instruments needed to defuse it, namely first and foremost the World Bank, the IMF, the future World Trade Organization, the Social Summit in Copenhagen in March 1995, and of course the ILO. All provided that the political will to do so is present and that it embodies sufficient financial contributions.

First I would like to say a little bit about the Bretton Woods institutions.

Last year I was among the few delegates who took up the question of the structural rationalization programmes and spoke in favour of a more visible role of the ILO vis-a-vis the IMF and the World Bank. I have to admit that I felt somewhat lonely in that company.

This year, however, I am very pleased that the Director-General himself has taken up this question in his Report and linked it to the question as to whether the ILO member States want the organization to play a greater role on the international stage. The background for this question is partly the necessity of a linkage between the economy and the social dimension in order to solve the global crisis, particularly as it is based on the realization that the ILO is still far from being accepted as an important actor on the international stage. The Director-General expresses it this way "The ILO has little influence on the deliberations and policy decisions of the institutions which play an increasingly important role in the management of the world economy and whose influence is bound to grow still further, with the growing trend towards the globalization of trade and the closer interdependence of national economies."

My reply as to whether the ILO should play a greater role on the international stage continues to be a clear "yes"! The ILO must make itself visible and assume a distinct social role in relation to the World Bank and the IMF among others.

Mr. Camdessus, Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, has demanded a strengthening of the "social cornerstone" in order to add a fully-developed human dimension to a new international cooperation system on macroeconomic reforms. These are nice words indeed. But nothing has happened.

Just before leaving for Geneva I checked with the Nordic office under the World Bank whether there were any signs of the rhetoric from the World Bank and the IMF having been translated into practice, and I received the reply that it had not. Reality continues to be the so-called "shock therapy" without the accompanying waiving of debt so crucial to many countries' survival as independent nations. And contrary to the image which the metaphor "shock therapy" suggests, namely a brief, but pronounced shock which leads to a rapid, though painful solution to the problems – dramatic price increases, liberalization of trade, devaluations and privatizations cannot bring about fast results. It has therefore turned out that the "shock therapy" has not worked in practice.

This is abundantly illustrated by the crisis figures on unemployment and poverty in the Report of the Director-General and in the comprehensive documentation following from other reports published by, for example, the ILO, UNICEF and the British relief organization OXFAM.

Given that the IMF and the World Bank are, in practice, far from realizing their own ideas of linking the social dimension to the economy, the ILO must not only offer, but demand, active participation, and make this publicly known.

In this respect, I support the Director-General's proposals concerning the gaining of influence on the world society through analysis of the impact of economic developments on the labour market and the social consequences thereof – and, in this connection, to create alternative social policies as discussed in the ILO Governing Body. I would even say that it is high time!

From the programmes on structural rationalization, I go on to the social clause in relation to the global economy and trade agreements. Also here the Director-General poses the question whether the ILO should take part in this debate. And once again my reply is an unconditional "yes".

The Director-General himself is somewhat uncertain concerning his attitude to the question – maybe because the necessary mandate is lacking – and he ends up in a complicated kind of ambiguity. But fortunately this is already history. In the ILO's paper "Towards full employment" for the informal tripartite meeting on ministerial level on Friday 10 June, the ILO's attitude is clear. A social clause, centred around universally recognized labour standards, will contribute to protecting the most vulnerable workers in the world economy against exploitation. And the clause is linked to the GATT agreements. This I welcome as a positive development on which I would like to congratulate the ILO. And the ILO is not alone. The spokesman of the European Union at the GATT meeting in Marrakesh in April, Sir Leon Brittan, said in his intervention that the social question cannot remain a taboo among the parties in the world economy. The WTO must actively involve itself in the question, in cooperation with the ILO and take up subjects such as child labour, forced labour, freedom of association, etc., which are close to the social clause advocated by the Workers' group and which have already been presented by Charles Gray and William Brett. Of course, there must be no double standards and of course the developing countries must be sure of their right to exploit their own comparative advantages and formulate their own policies suitable for their respective economic and social development, without being afraid of protectionist exploitation on the part of the industrialized countries. But this is a question of negotiation which could be solved with the ILO's tripartite assistance.

From this I go on to the Social Summit in Copenhagen where the key themes, as you all know, are the combating of unemployment and poverty, and the integration of the vulnerable groups in society. At the informal meeting on the Social Summit last Friday, I noted that out of the 108 ministers present, only one or two spoke against the proposal by the Director-General on the social clause. And in the Employers' group there was no agreement on opposition to the ILO's position. Seen in the right perspective, I therefore see a unique opportunity for the ILO to play a leading role at the Social Summit and especially in the follow-up to the meeting. This brings me back to the question of the ILO's role on the international stage, and I will make my conclusions in the following way: nobody is going to nominate or appoint the ILO to be the social watchdog in a global context. This role the ILO must take on itself, in relation to the World Bank, the IMF, GATT and the WTO. The ILO must seek to achieve this through many channels, including through support from national governments and the social partners. But the strategic breakthrough must take place at the Social Summit in Copenhagen in order for the ILO to be secured a key role in follow-up to this meeting.

The issue at stake is that the ILO should be given the mandate to become a sort of social GATT or WTO, with the objective of creating a competitive climate balanced against universally recognized social standards. It is a question of making the social adjustment programmes more socially acceptable. The IMF, the World Bank and WTO will be present at the World Summit, and the meeting is a good chance for the ILO. I would therefore urge the Director-General to make use of this opportunity in Copenhagen.

In conclusion, I as a Dane have the pleasure of saying to everybody present at this session of the Conference: welcome to Copenhagen, and let us jointly secure the ILO and its tripartite structure a strong role at the Summit itself and, most importantly, in the follow-up thereto. The ILO is our tool. Let us use it.

Original Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' adviser, Lebanon) – I should first like to congratulate the Organization on its 75th anniversary and to thank the Director-General on his penetrating and courageous Report that befits this worthy occasion: it is thought-provoking, stimulates the imagination and challenges us all to engage in an in-depth and purposeful discussion of the Organization's future prospects, and of its role, policy and working methods in the service of a changing world replete with challenges: poverty, oppression and underdevelopment.

If the founders of the Organization in 1919 set forth their ideas regarding the aims and means of the ILO in the Constitution and the participants in the Philadelphia Conference evaluated 25 years of work and made their famous Declaration, what is our most fitting response today, 75 years after the foundation and 50 years after the Declaration?

In his Report the Director-General examines a wide range of issues, raising questions to which he expects us to respond. I have selected two topics since I have neither the time nor the specialist knowledge to deal with them all.

The first concerns the "tripartite" structure of the Organization. The Director-General notes the importance of the ILO's unique status among international organizations in that respect and describing it as an historical asset. I shall try to respond to some of the questions that he raises.

Yes, tripartism as we know it from the Constitution and in practice is still a highly effective means of addressing social issues and the move to democracy makes it more essential than ever before.

It is true that informal economic activity has spread to such an extent that it virtually constitutes a separate sector but it is also true that such activity has always existed and that the change, despite its scale, is still one of quantity. Likewise agricultural work: it is nothing new and it is not expanding, but what is new is the growing awareness of its importance and the need to assist its development.

It is true that "tripartism" has existed in its present form for 75 years but it is even more true that it could not have effectively survived without evolving in accordance with the times and circumstances: it had to evolve to accommodate problems relating to the independence of peoples and continents and the efforts of societies to emerge from underdevelopment, to modernize themselves and acquire technology and to make quantitative leaps forward in economic development and social liberation.

The development in employers' organizations and trade unions has had a positive impact on their role in the ILO, the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body, the industrial committees and other meetings. If the International Labour Office is more concerned today than in the past to include all groups in society among its activities, this development must be based on "tripartism", whose usefulness has withstood the passage of time. And if the demands of socioeconomic development have made it necessary for the ILO to listen to the views of wider sectors of society, this must also be achieved through "tripartite" mechanisms, which are the sole means of organizing the representation of the relevant groups so that their positions and needs are taken into account. There is no need for such rash action as forcing the Organization to become involved in the complexities of representative machinery.

The second matter I intend to discuss is technical cooperation. My first criticism of the Report is that it fails to devote a separate chapter to the subject, addressing it instead here and there throughout the different sections so that one almost gets the impression that technical cooperation is not the mainstay of the Organization's work. If we add up the amount of expenditure and staff devoted to technical cooperation, we find that its programmes account for at least half of the activities of the International Labour Office.

The importance of technical cooperation does not consist in its volume alone but also in its aims and impact. For how can the ILO assist in promoting productive employment, in combating underdevelopment and poverty, in protecting workers and their health, and in raising productivity and hence standards of living without human resources who are aware of these aims and trained to achieve them?

It is not enough to set standards aimed at achieving the Organization's goals when we find that many of the standards are not ratified and very many are not implemented. We must also help the social partners, especially in the developing countries, to create the economic conditions and the development structures that make it possible and beneficial to apply the standards. We should not threaten to cut off technical assistance if they fail to apply specific standards.

Multidisciplinary teams are an effective means of ensuring technical cooperation based on exchanges of information and constructive dialogue between the ILO and the social partners and perhaps one of the advantages of this type of dialogue is that it gives the specialist members of the teams the chance to engage in direct consultations, to form an understanding of needs and to provide assistance in accordance with programmes and plans, and in some cases projects, that the central technical administrations and the International Training Centre in Turin can help to implement.

In conclusion, I join others in asking: What is the role of the ILO in tomorrow's world, the world described by the Director-General in his Report and about which he raises a number of questions?

It seems to me that our Organization should continue to play a leading and fundamental role among international organizations for the creation of employment opportunities, the enhancement of human resources and the protection of workers and working conditions, and that it should remain, first and foremost, a protector of freedoms, a prominent defender of the right of all human beings to a free and decent life and to choose their work and occupation.

In order to maintain that position, the Organization needs to do two things: firstly, to provide effective, purposeful and specific support to its tripartite constituents, and, secondly, to adjust its organs and working methods to bring them into line with its new tasks.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL-JASEM ((Employers' delegate, Kuwait) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like, first of all, to convey to you all the greetings of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry in Kuwait, which represents the employers in my country. May I also congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to steer the deliberations of this Conference and I wish them every success in their task. It is also my pleasure to welcome the Sultanate of Oman, the Republic of South Africa, Tajikistan and Turkmenistan who have just joined the ILO.

When we think back to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference we will no doubt remember that it was a very special occasion. Indeed, it is being held at a moment in history when developments are shaping its particular character; it is very different from previous sessions. It is also commemorating the 75th anniversary of this noble organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It is also the first session to be held since the abolition of apartheid in South Africa, after a long and bitter struggle in which the ILO played a leading role – of which we can be proud.

We are extremely honoured to be participating in this celebration of the 75th anniversary of our organization because its founding marked a decisive turning point in history: it introduced the concept of social justice to the modern world, thus protecting it against dangers which could have had very serious repercussions. Industrial growth and technological progress have had a high social cost and have affected working conditions and industrial relations.

Since its creation, the ILO has clearly defined its philosophy; it has set out to lay the foundations of social peace based on justice and human rights. To attain this objective it has adopted its unique tripartite structure which is a sort of international parliament grouping all the social partners throughout the world. The International Labour Conference and the regional conferences have become forums where the member States of the ILO may meet to settle their differences, smooth out contradictions and try to find joint solutions to problems. These meetings do not encroach upon the rights of workers; neither do they overlook the interests of employers. They rather try to bring both parties together so that they can give voice to the principles and values proclaimed in the Declaration of Philadelphia – the 50th anniversary of which we are commemorating today.

If credit must be given where it is due, I believe that it is the duty of our Conference, at a time when it is recalling the achievements of this Organization over the past 75 years, to express its gratitude to those of previous generations who have helped to build it up and contribute to the greatness of this institution. And I am particularly referring to the three parties who have represented their countries and their organizations and to those who have served the organization's objectives by working at the ILO throughout this period. We are truly grateful to them all.

On behalf of the employers of Kuwait, I should like to congratulate the ILO on its diamond jubilee and express our gratitude for its achievements at the international level, especially for its support of the rights of Kuwaitis during the tragedy which occurred on 2 August 1990. Kuwait is still suffering the consequences of this barbarian aggression and the documents of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body bear witness to this state of affairs.

In his Report, Defending values, promoting change, the Director-General has raised a number of vital issues which warrant our attention. If I may be allowed to say, the Director-General has taken the side of one of the social partners to the detriment of the other when he writes: "Our mission is to help them to grow into States genuinely governed by the rule of law and able to guarantee basic human rights, and the rights of workers in particular." But what about the scores of employers who are living under a regime which I shall not mention – a regime which hangs employers and tradesmen in front of their shops until they die, without any fair trial and under false pretexts. Are they not entitled to be defended by our Organization? The Report also speaks about the "social clause" in the context of an increasingly global economy.

I should like to draw the Director-General's attention to the need for the Office to take into account the economic and social situation of developing countries when this item is discussed.

The Report also mentions the emergence of a number of Asian countries as dynamic leaders in the world economy. In this context, I should like to propose that the ILO undertakes a study to assess developments in these countries which might serve as a reference for many developing countries aspiring to growth. Chapter 2 of the Report deals with a very vital subject: the values and structures of the ILO. We share the Director-General's concern about the rapid and continuous changes that have occurred throughout the world since the end of the Cold War, making it necessary for the Organization to review its working methods, instruments and standards which constitute the cornerstone of its activities; but how can we set about this task without affecting the basic nature of the work of the Organization and undermining it in the eyes of some?

The Report refers to a new concept concerning the most developed countries and societies – the concept of "post-industrial or post-modern society". This new term warrants the attention of economists and specialists because of the implications this might have – either positive or negative – on the various countries.

We agree with the Director-General when he says that we need to revise standards which have become outdated and to re-examine the role of certain Conventions, some of which are recent and have not even been ratified. Allow me also to say that we should revise the questionnaires which the Office sends to its member States and, through them, to the employers' and workers' organizations and federations.

Chapter 4 of the Report has a section entitled "A partner in technical cooperation". This deals with the ILO's new role in technical cooperation and the policy of "active partnership" it has adopted, consisting, among other things, of setting up multi-disciplinary teams in the various regions. I should like to congratulate the Organization on this new approach; we consider this to be a positive change in its activities and in the way it is fulfilling its obligations to its member States in the area of technical cooperation. However, given the fact that this approach is entirely new, the Office should do everything possible to publish more information on this subject and also ensure that it chooses outstanding members for its teams.

In ending my comments on this valuable report, I would like to refer to the Director-General's intention to publish an annual report, containing an authoritative analysis of the situation of employment and incomes in the world, and the impact of economic and financial policies on them. While congratulating the Director-General on his proposal, I should like to suggest that the report should be bi-annual so that it accurately reflects the situation in a number of countries. I should also like to refer to the Director-General's suggestion that the Governing Body should, every two years, hold high-level sittings at its March Session, at which government members would be represented at the ministerial level. The Director-General did not specify if Ministers of Labour, Planning or Finance would be invited to this meeting. It is an important proposal; but it is not clear.

In concluding, I should like to thank you for your attention and pray God to have pity on our martyrs and to free Kuwaiti hostages and persons of other nationalities.

May the peace of God, his mercy and grace, go with you.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABOU LAHCEN (Employers' adviser and substitute delegate, Morocco) – I would first like to congratulate Mr. Charles Gray on his election to the presidency of this Conference. On behalf of the employers of Morocco and in my own name, I wish him every success in his endeavours. I also wish to congratulate the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization for the important annual report he has submitted on the occasion of this session.

Defending values, promoting change is the title of the Report submitted by the Director-General on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of our Organization and on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. I would like to congratulate him on this Report and for the wealth of topics he has chosen to address and programmes he is proposing.

The changes which have occurred in our economic and social world should indeed prompt us to defend certain values while making appropriate adjustments.

I do agree with the three main points reaffirmed in the introduction of the Director-General's Report, namely, social justice as a fundamental value of the Organization, the importance of the principle of tripartism as a motivating force, and the adjustment of the Organization and its secretariat to the tasks that lie ahead. They are in line with the requirements of the development of the market economy. In my view, however, they also need to adjust to the situation of enterprises as units for the production of assets.

Tripartism is one of the essential features of our Organization. We note that this principle is becoming increasingly topical, although it has been applied by the ILO since 1919. Indeed, several countries have set up economic and social councils which operate on the basis of the principle of tripartism.

My country, the Kingdom of Morocco, recently amended its Constitution precisely with a view to establishing an economic and social council whose membership will include representatives of the employers, workers and government. Since 1990, we have also a High Committee, consisting of representatives of these three social partners, which discusses various demands submitted by employers or workers.

As regards the activities of the ILO in the field of standard setting, it must be recognized, with full objectivity, that the Organization's work in this area deserves every commendation, for it is unparalleled at the international level. However, the world is currently undergoing momentous changes, including the disappearance of the Communist bloc, the end of a bipolar world, the predominance of a market economy, globalization of the economy and the weakening of the nation State. All these changes call for our Organization to adjust its standard-setting activity better to enterprises' needs, labour market characteristics and the requirements of social justice.

I would like to point out that I fully agree with the proposal made by the Director-General in his Report regarding the need for a kind of "soft law", i.e. the development of texts that would not have the same legal status as official international labour standards but which governments and other decision-makers might take into consideration in dealing with specific problems.

Labour law and the right to work raise a major issue. Everybody recognizes the negative effects of unemployment, which is increasingly throughout the world. This is true for both developing and developed countries. It has been decided to convene a summit in 1995 to deal with social development issues. I do not claim to provide a solution to unemployment, but I wish to stress that major importance should be given to private enterprises, because employment creation largely depends on the creation of new enterprises and the development of existing ones.

The employers of Morocco have always stressed the need to create a favourable environment for the stimulation and development of enterprises by providing them with a range of incentives. The Moroccan Government has taken the necessary measures to this effect.

Another essential factor in job creation is the need to ensure that the educational and training system matches labour market needs so as to enable young people to acquire the technical skills that enterprises need. In this connection, Morocco has established a higher council for youth which conducts studies and research aimed at improving the match between training policy and the needs of producers. We consider that the International Labour Organization has a role to play in respect of enterprises by promoting closer links between training strategies and enterprises' needs. To this end, a number of suggestions can be made.

First, we should use all available means of technical cooperation, especially the multidisciplinary teams. Second, information and analyses should be provided on the subject of labour and employment. And, third, as many training and information seminars as possible must be organized for enterprises.

I would like to express support for the Director-General's proposal to include the topic of employment and the improvement of living standards in the agendas of the sessions of the International Labour Conference. The study of this issue could produce useful information for employers, workers and governments, following the implementation of a structural adjustment programme over the past 10 years, which succeeded in redressing major economic imbalances. My country, Morocco, is now giving primary emphasis to social concerns in all of its development programmes, thereby stressing the importance of this factor in the overall balance of society.

However, emphasis on social concerns should not affect macroeconomic equilibrium. A balance must therefore be struck between the need to maintain that equilibrium and the need to ensure greater social justice, bearing in mind the interrelationship between economic development and social justice.

Before concluding, I would like to thank all those who have worked so hard to made this Conference a success.

Original Arabic: Mr. RASHED (Workers' delegate, Egypt) – In the name of God, most merciful and compassionate! I would like to congratulate Mr. Gray on the confidence placed in him and his election to chair this session of the Conference. This confirms the importance attached to the role of the workers. I would also like to congratulate the Officers of the Conference and wish them all every success in their difficult task of ensuring the positive outcome of the work of the ILO.

This session of the Conference coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. We hope that the ILO will continue to forge ahead and play the role assigned to it in order to protect social justice and combat poverty wherever it may strike, reduce unemployment and participate actively in finding effective solutions which will help us gain the upper hand and turn the principles of justice and peace into reality.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report, which is both clear and frank and defines the future role of the ILO. The Report lives up to the aspirations of all those who have the honour to belong to this Organization.

Today's world which was clearly described by the Director-General impels us to strengthen the role of the ILO, so that it can find real solutions to the social problems which have arisen. In other words, we must consolidate the Organization and its means of action to ensure social justice and establish standards giving greater guarantees of protection for workers and safeguarding their rights.

We wish to confirm the importance we attach to the ILO and its essential role. It is the only institution whose structure is capable of responding to the needs of democracy. At this point I would like to turn to the principle of tripartism.

At the same time, we hope that at the next stage the ILO, as the Director-General said in his Report, will step up its efforts and strengthen technical cooperation on behalf of the developing countries, especially in the fields of planning, employment and workers' organizations, so that these countries will be able to create employment, eliminate unemployment and provide workers with education at every level.

We, the workers of the Third World, would like to see serious consideration given to the call to link trade with international labour standards, that is, the call for a social clause.

Apparently motivated by a concern for generosity, this call in fact masks unjust intentions, that is, the desire to export unemployment from the richest countries to the poorest.

The countries of the Third World, which are going through a period of transformation, need to improve their social and economic situation. They cannot attain overnight the level of the industrialized countries that went through the industrial revolution long ago.

We are fully aware that genuine economic progress is essential if any social progress is to be achieved.

Allow me to mention now what has been done in my own country, Egypt, to adapt labour legislation to world developments. I am referring to the new Egyptian Labour Code, which was drafted thanks to the active and serious participation of the three social partners: government, employers and workers. Its special provisions and its main themes were widely discussed in the International Labour Office and in the opinion of the experts it was found to be in accordance with international labour standards. This once again provides proof of Egypt's respect for its international commitments.

I would like to extend my warm congratulations to the ILO. Indeed, this will be the last session at which a Committee on Apartheid will meet. Democracy has prevailed in South Africa, the distinguished leader Nelson Mandela has come to power in accordance with the will of the majority, and the tripartite delegation of South Africa has done us the honour of taking part in this session of the Conference. We are also delighted to extend a warm welcome to the delegations of Oman and Tajikistan.

I wish you full success in the work of this session. It is my hope that our Organization will continue its work on the path of progress.

May peace, mercy and the grace of God be with you!

Mr. CALAMATTA (Workers' delegate, Malta) – Please allow me to express my warmest and most sincere congratulations to Mr. Gray on his appointment to preside over the discussions at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, which also marks the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the International Labour Organization. I would like also to join those who have taken the floor before me in expressing my complete faith in his vast experience and in his considerable personal qualities which, I am sure, will be a guarantee of the wise guidance which we will receive in our debates.

Secondly, I wish to convey to all of you gathered here the greetings of the workers of Malta, and especially of the members of my Union – the General Workers' Union – and of the other Maltese unions grouped in the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions.

The Report of the Director-General of the ILO – for which he should be highly commended – does not hide the fact that he wants this Conference to promote social justice in a rapidly changing world. As the Director-General said, at a press conference in Brussels to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO, we are living in a world that has "converted to the market economy" and is undergoing a very difficult period of change, especially as a result of privatizations and deregulations.

I cannot but concur with the Director-General that the explosion in international trade was accompanied by an explosion in social problems, and we can no longer consider the social dimension separately from the economic dimension.

Within this context, we cannot address workers' rights without also tackling the problem of the working people's most fundamental right, which is the right to work. And this problem needs to be tackled with urgency considering that nearly every country is suffering from unemployment. There are 700 million unemployed in the world and the most recent estimates point to the fact that over 40 million jobseekers are being annually added to the worldwide labour force.

Having said this, I now come to the situation in my country, Malta, where unemployment is again on the rise, presenting us with an ominous situation following a period when it was reduced to socially acceptable levels.

Malta is a small country in terms of both geography and population. It has a high import bill and its economy depends wholly on exports of manufactured goods, ship-repair works (which account for nearly 40 per cent of the gross domestic product), and other tertiary sector activities.

My country therefore has an open economy exposed to the whirlwinds of the global economy – meaning that what happens in the world, especially in Europe and in countries on the Mediterranean rim, has a considerable impact on us.

Since 1992 we started to face, although not yet in an aggressive way, the blows of the international recession, and we experienced, and are still experiencing, job losses mainly in the manufacturing sector, and most especially in textiles, clothing and apparel industries.

But to make matters worse the Government, without any justified reason, devalued the Maltese lira – a decision which proved to be very wrong. Devaluation not only resulted in high rises in the cost of living, but also contributed to further job losses due to increased production costs.

As a result of this and a plenitude of other reasons, unemployment, which stood at 3.6 per cent of the labour supply at the end of 1991, rose to 4 per cent by the end of 1992, and reached 4.5 per cent in December of last year.

Some may say that these are not high unemployment figures, but the situation starts to be alarming when one takes into consideration that of those gainfully employed, 3.5 per cent were in temporary employment at the end of 1993.

Furthermore, all indications show that unemployment is to continue to rise. Warnings of an increase in the jobless population have already been given by the Central Bank of Malta.

When analysing the unemployment statistics, one comes across facts which should be very disturbing and therefore call for serious and effective action on the part of the Maltese Government. For example, according to the latest accurate statistics, 63 per cent of the unemployed are in the 26 to 49 age bracket – meaning that a very substantial number of workers in the prime of their life are without a job.

Apart from this, there is the fact that unemployed people aged 40 upwards find it very difficult, if not impossible, to get a job because employers prefer employing and training younger people from whom they are assured to profit from long years of work.

The 1993 trends indicate that the number of unemployed persons in the 26 to 49 age group is to increase, so is it also very likely that the number of persons in long-term unemployment will also increase.

While the share of short-term unemployment (that is, those registering as unemployed for less than eight weeks) remained relatively stable during 1993, the share of medium-term unemployment (those registering for eight to 48 weeks), declined by 9.6 per cent to 35.1 per cent.

But this decline was entirely absorbed by long-term unemployment (those registering for more than 48 weeks), whose share rose by 10 per cent to 52 per cent.

According to the Central Bank of Malta's annual report for 1993, this shift away from medium-term to long-term unemployment seems to indicate that many of those previously falling within the medium-term unemployed category were unable to find jobs and moved to the long-term group.

The Central Bank report warns that this shift away from medium- to long-term unemployment seems to imply that we have a hard core of unemployment which is proving difficult to break. And to this I add that the longer it takes to break this core, the harder it will get and the situation could become unmanageable.

It is really depressing speaking of unemployed workers and unemployment problems, so I wish to conclude my address to this assembly by speaking of something positive and encouraging – and this is that the social partners in Malta are in full agreement that the Conditions of Employment (Regulation) Act of 1952 needs a general overhaul.

This piece of legislation – which for short we refer to as CERA – was a milestone when it was enacted 42 years ago. But after all these years, which have brought with them new working methods, new industries, new concepts and new philosophies, the CERA in many of its aspects does not respond well to today's needs.

So it is encouraging for us as trade unionists that the Maltese Government's Parliamentary Secretariat for Human Resources is redrafting the 1952 Act and it is doing so following full consultations with trade unions, employers' bodies and other interested organizations.

My union – the General Workers' Union – has submitted a long list of amendments and new provisions for the new CERA Act and is insisting that, wherever applicable, the Act should be in conformity with the relevant ILO Conventions.

Among the proposals being made by my union are the following:

First, when a worker suffers a permanent disability following an accident at the workplace and cannot continue working in the same job, the employer should be duty-bound to provide him with an alternative, suitable job within the same enterprise.

Second, the privileged wage in the case of company bankruptcies should be no less than the equivalent of six months' pay, because the present sum is inadequate and does not reflect today's wage levels.

Third, workers employed on a part-time or casual basis should not be deprived of adequate social protection and should benefit from recreation leave, sick leave and other conditions, the amount of which should be in proportion to the number of hours they work.

Fourth, definite work contracts should be limited to certain types of work only and where such contracts are renewed periodically year in year out, the employers should be obliged to automatically put the workers concerned on indefinite work contracts.

I really do hope that in regard to the new CERA legislation we will not have to wait for over six years as was the case with a new occupational health and safety law promised by Government in 1987 but only submitted to Parliament and enacted earlier this year.

I think it would be very befitting if the new CERA legislation is enacted by Parliament this year during which we are marking the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the International Labour Organization.

We would thus be able to crown this anniversary year by giving the Maltese workers better means to pursue – in the words of the ILO in its Declaration of Philadelphia, 1944, Article II(a) – "both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity".

Original Russian: Mr. MAYKO (Employers' delegate, Ukraine) – Allow me to join in congratulating the President on his election to a post of such responsibility in a memorable anniversary year for the ILO, and to express my conviction that under his leadership this session will conclude its work successfully.

The Director-General's Report, both by its title and by its content, embodies the experience and the wisdom of the ILO. I believe that the future activity of the Organization will endow it with even greater authority.

For the employers of Ukraine – and I assure you, for all its people as well – virtually all the issues raised in the Director-General's Report are of the utmost importance.

A young State, Ukraine has just begun to draft its policy in the social and labour field, so today it is particularly important for us to understand which values should be defended from among those we had in the past, and what changes should be promoted.

We are building a democratic State with a market economy; we are trying to become an integral part of the world market. These are good intentions: the market economy is more progressive than that which is centrally planned; a democratic society allows the individual to develop more. The reality, however, is different. The loss of old traditional markets, the disruption of former production linkages, the lack of experience in independent administration of the State – add to this the problems of conversion of many enterprises, the extent of which is difficult for employers and statesmen of other countries to understand – despite our natural resources, despite our strong productive and scientific potential, all of this has led today to a serious decline in production, a worsening of the social protection of the population and a drop in the workers' standard of living.

Society has been split according to standard of living into very rich and poor. This is creating social tension in a society whose standard of living in the past, though perhaps not very high, was almost the same for everyone.

I have referred to just a few of the problems that are of concern today for the people of Ukraine, but even they show how important the experience of the ILO is for us and how our State has a stake in further increasing the role of the Organization, since I am convinced that the problems facing other countries today – the globalization of the economy, changes in employment due to technological progress – will concern us sooner or later.

I would like to give you an example of how we are using this experience.

In order to find a solution to social and labour problems, a decree was signed by the President of Ukraine on 8 February 1993 concerning the establishment of a national Social Partnership Council, and on 27 April last year the Regulations respecting the National Council were adopted.

The main objectives set down in the Regulations are as follows: the preparation of recommendations to the President of Ukraine on social policy; tripartite consultations in the social and labour field, taking into account the interests of the State, owners and workers, and the search for a compromise between the social partners in order to avert disputes; participation in drafting legislation, agreements and proposals concerning labour legislation, taking international standards into account; the preparation of sectoral agreements; consultation on ratification and denunciation of ILO Conventions.

The Council is headed by three co-presidents (one from the State, one from the employers and one from the trade unions). Thanks to the active work of this Council, the Parliament of Ukraine has ratified six important ILO Conventions: the Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2), the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), etc.

During the short period of its existence the Council has considered 27 items, chiefly concerning the socio-economic situation of Ukraine and ways to remedy it, the elaboration of a national public works programme and the programme of activities of the Ukraine Government for September-December 1993 and 1994.

Recommendations to the President of Ukraine were drawn up on state policy in the field of labour relations.

We are convinced that almost all the questions which have been raised at the Conference will affect the life and the activities of our Alliance.

I would like to say a few words about the enterprise which I direct. It is a large plant in Kiev, with a branch in Rovno, and it produces radio equipment, military hardware, medical equipment and consumer goods. The plant has undergone extremely thorough and abrupt conversion of up to 89 per cent. Many specialists who advised the enterprise thought that it was impossible to convert the plant in such a short time to the production of non-military goods, but we managed to do it, and we have begun increasing our production of such goods. We have found customers in Western markets. We have maintained the social development programme of the collective, and are continuing to build housing, maintain and build resorts and places of leisure and kindergartens while carrying out further construction at the plant.

This has all been made possible thanks to the assistance of the State. But the main contributions have been made by the workers at the plant, who have organized the production of products for which there is demand on the market. A Ukranian-Austrian joint enterprise has been established at the plant, and joint production is taking place with American and German firms. The plant is now being privatized.

As the Ukranian economy is restructured we can see the authority and the role of the Ukranian Alliance of Entrepreneurs and Industrialists (USPP) growing. The Alliance is composed of 4,500 associate members with various forms of ownership. They employ some 4,500,000 workers. The main objective of the Alliance is to defend the interests of entrepreneurs and enterprises.

The Alliance holds a dialogue with the Government on the development of State programmes, and defends the idea of equal opportunities for producers with various forms of ownership. It makes proposals to improve the financial and tax systems. The employers have firmly defended the stability of the legislation regulating foreign investments, and have enjoyed the support of the Government in this connection.

We are waiting for the employers of many countries with a market economy to weigh up the prospects of cooperation with the young Ukraine which is rich in natural resources, and boasts a wealth of productive and scientific potential. We are open to such cooperation.

Ukraine is proud of its participation in the ILO, and supports the vision of the Director-General with regard to the future development of the Organization because we know from experience how important it is to have the possibility of discussions with experienced persons and access to the experience and knowledge of specialists of many countries. However, we understand how complicated it is for the ILO to act when situations are continually changing.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Credentials

Second report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 10 June, when the Committee adopted its first report, credentials have been received from Armenia, bringing the total number of Member States at present represented at the Conference to 158. The number of delegates and advisers who have registered at the Conference at this time is contained in the annex to this report.

Substitute delegates

2. With respect to the composition of the delegations, the Employers' member of the Committee raised a question concerning the number of advisers who also appear as substitute delegates in the credentials. He considered that many countries were appointing considerably more substitute delegates than the number provided for by the Standing Orders. This could give rise to a problem, particularly towards the end of the Conference, where several members of a delegation had the power to vote on a particular subject. The other members of the Committee welcomed the flexibility provided by the appointment of substitutes and felt that the cure to the problem that had been mentioned lay with the delegates concerned exercising proper control over the casting of votes on their behalf.

3. Without seeking to interpret the basic rule – Article 3, paragraph 7 of the Constitution and Article 1, paragraph 3(1) of the Conference Standing Orders – which addressed a somewhat different situation, the Committee understood that the purpose was to ensure that delegations could exercise their right to vote right up to the end of the Conference. From this point of view, there was no need to appoint more substitutes than those required for the purpose of voting in Plenary (since advisers could be members of Committees, no problems could arise there). It was felt that the information given in the forms for credentials might be made clearer on this point. At the same time, the Committee concluded that, unless an objection were lodged with respect to the appointment of particular substitute delegates, the Committee should not take the matter further.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Morocco

4. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Morocco, submitted by the "Confédération démocratique du Travail (CDT)", under the signature of Mr. El Amoui Noubir.

5. The objecting organization stated that it had not been consulted on the nomination, in spite of its great representativity according to the last elections and that account had not been taken of the recommendations of the Credentials Committee at the African Regional Conference in 1994.

6. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. El Ghali Benhima, Permanent Representative of Morocco and Government delegate to the Conference, stated that the shop-steward elections in the three most representative central organizations, at the end of 1992 and beginning of 1993, resulted in the CDT having 16.08 per cent of the votes, UMT (to which the Workers' delegate belonged) having 26.93 percent and the third organization, 10.72 percent. The three organizations had been convened to a meeting as required by the ILO Constitution, but only the UMT had attended. Finally, the communication maintained that the objection was not receivable, pursuant to Article 26, paragraph 4(c) of the Conference Standing Orders, as the author was "serving as adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken".

7. In accordance with the Standing Orders, the Committee first took up the question of receivability raised by the Government. Noting that Mr. El Amoui Noubir had indeed become an adviser to the Workers' delegate subsequently to the objection, the Committee considered that the condition established by Article 26, paragraph 4(c) of the Standing Orders had been met and accordingly declared the objection not to be receivable.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic

8. The Committee examined an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Central African Republic submitted by the "Confédération syndicale des Travailleurs de Centrafrique (CSTC)".

9. The objecting organization maintained that, at the request of the Minister of the Public Service, five trade union central organizations in the country including the "Organisation du syndicat libre du secteur public (OSLP)", to which the Workers' delegate belonged, had attended a meeting to determine the method of nomination of the Workers' delegate to the International Labour Conference. The meeting took place on 11 April 1994. According to the minutes of the meeting, which were annexed to the objection, and communicated to the Government, a timetable for the rotation of the trade union centres had been established on the basis of the various proposals made. The timetable indicated the following order of representation: CSTC, CCTC, USTC, CNTC, OSLP, the latter's turn for proposing the Worker's delegate being 1998. The minutes were not signed by the OSLP, which had withdrawn its proposal before the timetable was established. In addition, the objecting organization claimed that the Worker's delegate held a politico-administrative position which was incompatible with the exercise of trade union activities. For these reasons, the Workers' delegate was not validly appointed.

10. The Committee heard Mr. Fidèle Ogbami, Minister of the Public Service, Labour, Social Security and Professional Training and Head of the Delegation to the Conference, who also presented a written statement to the Committee. He informed the Committee of the particular situation of his country, which had recently instituted political and trade union pluralism, and then referred to the five trade union centres mentioned by the objecting organization (CSTC). While he had reasons to believe that the CSTC and the CCTC were much less representative than the three others, the five centres had been considered on an equal footing, pending the establishment of criteria for the determination of representativity. In this regard, a draft decree had been drawn up by the Government and transmitted to the centres for comment. The meeting of 11 April to which the objection referred had been preceded by a meeting held on 8 March, the minutes of which were communicated to the Committee by the Minister. According to the minutes, four of the centres had agreed to nominate the OSLP. Since the fifth centre had called into question the conclusions of 8 March, the Minister had requested them to meet again. As the meeting of 11 April was still inconclusive, the Government decided to take into account the results of the meeting of 8 March. As regards the functions of the Workers' delegate, the Minister indicated that the exercise of trade union functions was not incompatible with public service.

11. The Committee considered that the allegations relating to the functions of the delegate were contradicted by his presence – without any objection whatsoever – at the various meetings of the Workers' organizations. On the main question raised in the objection, the Committee observed that, in the absence of criteria for determining the representative character of the organizations, the Government had sought to get the five centres to agree on the representation to the 81st session of the Conference. It noted that the Government had nominated the Workers' delegate on the basis of the first meeting, the minutes of which had been signed only by the Chairman/Secretary but appeared to be more conclusive than those of the second meeting. The Committee considered that a further effort could perhaps have been made by the Government after the impass of 11 April with a view to reaching agreement among the five centres. It drew attention to the importance of providing statistical data in order to permit it to assess the representative character of the organizations. The Committee noted that a decree was being drawn up and hoped that in the future there would be no doubt as to the representative character of the Workers' delegate to the Conference in keeping with Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution. The Committee therefore decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nepal

12. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nepal submitted by the General Federation of Nepalese Trade Unions (GEFONT).

13. According to the objecting organization, the organization to which the delegate belonged, the Nepal Trade Union Congess (NTUC), was a "paper" union, consisting of employers and managers and chosen by the Government for political reasons. GEFONT considered that it should have been selected to participate in the Conference.

14. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Dr. Govind Prasad Regmi, Government delegate of Nepal to the Conference, stated that trade union legislation had recently been promulgated in Nepal and trade union elections would be held in the near future. This process would help in determining the respective strength and character of the trade unions. The Workers' delegate was the president of NTUC, which had had a long history of promoting freedom of association and workers' rights. It had an extensive nationwide membership and representative character. For financial reasons only one member could be appointed for each non-governmental delegation.

15. The Committee recalled that, in 1992 at the 79th Session of the Conference, when a similar objection had been lodged by GEFONT, the Committee had expressed the hope that the adoption of the new trade union legislation would remove any doubts concerning the representative character of future Workers' delegates of Nepal to the Conference. Now that the legislation had been adopted and trade union elections were imminent, the Committee reiterated that hope and, noting once again the lack of information, in the various communications, concerning the representative character of GEFONT and NTUC, decided not to uphold the objection.

Communication concerning the Delegation of Zaire

16. The Committee took note of a letter to the President of the Conference dated 10 June 1994 and signed by Mr. Wodia Mutombo G., as representative of the "Gouvernement de Transition under Mr. Etienne Tshisekedi" of Zaire. The letter set out the composition of the delegation of Zaire, as communicated to the representative by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the "Gouvernement de Transition". For the reasons given by the Committee last year, in its report on the representation of Zaire (80th Session of the Conference, Provisional Record No. 14, page 14/46), it was not possible to treat this communication as credentials.

17. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Second report of the Credentials Committee 19

No. 14 – Saturday, 18 June 1994

PRINTED IN SWITZERLAND

International Labour Conference
Provisional Record
Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

15 (rev.)

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

First report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 14 June 1994 with Mrs. Y. Zhang (China) as Chairperson and Reporter, and Mr. S. Randiga (Kenya) as Vice-Chairperson.

Status of collection of member States' contributions

2. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing information on the status of collection of member States' contributions as at 31 May 1994.

3. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) reported that since the preparation of the document contributions had been received from the following member States:

Country	Swiss francs
Albania	20 174
Guatemala	126 510
Malaysia	404 573
Morocco	101 466
Mauritania	81 718
Portugal	673 996
Romania	359 477
Senegal	29 246
Trinidad and Tobago	270 467
Zimbabwe	99 699
Total	2 167 326

4. The receipt of these amounts meant that Malaysia, Morocco and Portugal had now paid their 1994 contributions in full, and Mauritania and Senegal had recovered the right to vote.

5. In reply to a query from the representative of Italy, the Treasurer advised that total 1994 contributions received to date now amounted to 144,372,721 Swiss francs.

6. The Committee took note of the information in the document.

Assessment of contributions of new member States: Scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for the 1994-95 financial period

7. The Committee had before it Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and other financial and administrative questions, and document FC/D.2, containing resolutions submitted by the Governing Body concerning the assessment of contributions for a number of new member States. Document FC/D.2 also contained a draft scale of assessments of member States' contributions for 1995 as recommended by the Government members of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body.

8. The representative of the Czech Republic wished to put on record its reservations as to the amount of the Czech contribution to the ILO, assessed on the basis of figures approved by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1993, of 0.42 per cent. The way this rate was established in the United Nations unfortunately contradicted principles of international law, in particular the principles of equity and non-discrimination. The Czech Republic therefore did not consider itself bound by the decision of the United Nations General Assembly concerning the rate of assessment for its contribution. The rate of the Czech contribution to the United Nations was not stipulated properly as that of a new member State of the United Nations. The Czech Republic was ready to pay its contributions to the ILO and to other international organizations' budgets based on the UN scale of assessments on a provisional basis only until this problem was settled in the United Nations organs.

9. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt these resolutions, the texts of which appear at the end of this report.

Arrangement for the settlement of amounts due by Viet Nam

10. The Committee had before it document FC/D.4, proposing a resolution for the settlement of amounts due by Viet Nam.

11. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Arrangement for the settlement of amounts due by Albania

12. The Committee had before it document FC/D.5, proposing a resolution for the settlement of amounts due by Albania.

13. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Financial report and audited financial statements for 1992-93

14. The Committee had before it the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for the 63rd financial period (1992-93); Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and other financial and administrative questions; and document FC/D.3, containing a recommendation submitted by the Governing Body that the Conference adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1992-93.

15. The representative of China congratulated the Chairperson and Vice-Chairperson of the Finance Committee on their appointments. The financial report and audited financial statements showed clearly the financial situation of the Office as well as details of how it had carried out the programme and budget activities for 1992-93. Although the Office had anticipated a shortfall in 1992-93 by reducing administrative expenditure and rescheduling programmes, it should probably have done more to collect outstanding contributions. The financial statements showed that at the end of 1993 some 125 million Swiss francs of contributions, representing about one-third of the annual total, remained unpaid. The Office could perhaps make better use of its relations with other international organizations and look at their experiences to help find ways of collecting outstanding contributions. It should also liaise more closely with member States and look at other ways of raising funds. Resources could be used more effectively if the Office was able to reduce administrative overheads even further.

16. The Treasurer said that the late payment of member States' contributions was a matter of great concern to the Office. An early payment incentive scheme had been introduced in 1989 but regrettably had made little or no difference to the pattern of payment of contributions. An alternative would be to impose financial penalties on member States if they failed to pay on time. One or two of the smaller organizations of the UN system already had such schemes and their record of collection of contributions was significantly better than that of the other organizations.

17. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1992-93 in accordance with article 29 of the Financial Regulations, and accordingly that it adopt the resolution the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Treatment of the 1992-93 cash surplus

18. The Committee had before it Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and other financial and administrative questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the cash surplus for the 1992-93 biennium.

19. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Treatment of the amount received from the Compagnie Générale de Climatisation et de Maintenance

20. The Committee had before it Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and other financial and administrative questions, containing a resolution concerning a receipt from the Compagnie Générale de Climatisation et de Maintenance.

21. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization

22. The Committee had before it Report II: Information concerning the Programme and Budget for 1994-95 and other financial and administrative questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

23. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Appendices

24. A table showing the contributions due from member States for 1995 is appended to this report (Appendix I). A statement of appropriations from the 1992-93 cash surplus is also appended to this report (Appendix II).

Geneva, 17 June 1994. (Signed) Mrs. Y. Zhang,
Chairperson and Reporter.

Resolution concerning the treatment of the 1992-93 cash surplus

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Noting that for the 1992-93 biennium an excess of regular budget income over regular budget expenditure has resulted in a cash surplus of 24,230,334 Swiss francs (equivalent to $16,710,574 at the 1994-95 budget rate of exchange of 1.45 Swiss francs to the US dollar),

Decides, as an exceptional one-time measure and in derogation of article 18 of the Financial Regulations, to finance expenditure itemized in Appendix IV to the First Report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee (reproduced as Appendix II to this Report), amounting to 21,729,700 Swiss francs from the cash surplus, thereby reducing by a corresponding amount the sum which would otherwise be available for reducing member States' contributions for 1994-95,

Notes that, taking into account the above appropriation, the amount available under article 18 of the Financial Regulations for reducing the assessed contributions of member States for 1995 will be 2,500,634 Swiss francs.

International Labour Conference
Provisional Record 16
Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

Seventeenth (special) sitting

Thursday, 16 June 1994, 3 p.m.

Presidents: Mr. Gray, Mr. Ould Sidi

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL ON THE SITUATION OF WORKERS OF THE OCCUPIED ARAB TERRITORIES: DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – I would like to call to order the special sitting of the Conference to examine the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

Before giving the floor to the first speaker, I would like to remind you of the arrangements which I announced to the Conference yesterday afternoon.

First, the maximum length of speeches fixed by the Conference at seven minutes, with the exception of those speakers who would speak on behalf of groups of countries such as the European Community and the Arab Maghreb Union who would be granted ten minutes. I would earnestly call on all speakers to respect the time-limit for their interventions and appeal to all of you kindly to abide by the decisions of the Conference Standing Orders and the decisions taken by the Conference in order to give this debate both the dignity and the respect its deserves.

May I also remind you that, if there are any requests for the right of reply, they will be granted at the end of the sitting and should be limited to two minutes.

Finally, I would remind the representatives of non-governmental organizations who register to speak that they will be authorized to speak at the end of the sitting.

Original Arabic: Mr. RAMLAWI (representative, Palestine) – I should first like to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and to thank the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, for his useful two-part Report and for the Appendix dealing with the situation of labour and workers in the occupied Palestinian and Arab territories. I also wish to express my gratitude and appreciation to the representatives of the Director-General who visited the occupied territories and provided the Director-General with basic first-hand information on the situation of labour and workers under Israeli occupation, circumstances that call for careful attention and effective action on the part of the International Labour Organization.

If we compare the Report of the Director-General to this session with those that preceded it, we realize the gravity of the persistent Israeli practices that affect the living conditions of Palestinian workers and of the Palestinian people as a whole. These practices have continued in spite of the signing of the Washington and Cairo agreements between the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Government of Israel concerning the interim self-rule period. The Report drew attention to the persistent policy of the Israeli occupation authorities, who kill and imprison Palestinians, perpetrate massacres, impose collective punishment, destroy their homes, seal off their regions, deprive workers of their rights and prevent them from reaching their jobs, confiscate their land and water, annex their economy to Israel's, and continually expand Israeli settlements and establish new ones in the occupied territories, all of which has made the lives of Palestinian workers and all sectors of the Palestinian population an unbearable hell on earth that has bred violence in the past and continues to generate violence today between Israeli soldiers and settlers who occupy the land by force of arms, perpetrating all forms of oppression in order to tighten their grip on Palestinian land, and Palestinian citizens defending themselves, their livelihood and survival, their land and their property. The former is armed with military force and instruments of murder, destruction and oppression, while the latter is armed with the rights, legislation and lofty principles established by the international community to bring about justice and friendly relations among nations. The Report of the Director-General gives a true account of the facts although some parts require further expansion and greater objectivity to shed full light on the seriousness of the Israeli practices in the occupied Palestinian territories, which has an impact not only on the living conditions of the workers and people of Palestine but also on the peace process that began in Madrid.

As I say, the peace process began in Madrid and the Palestine Liberation Organization took part in it and played a leading role in ensuring its success in the belief that it was essential to reach a just settlement that would guarantee rights and security for all parties under the peace to which our Palestinian people aspire, based on international law, the principle of returning the land to our people in return for peace, and implementation of Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. The process led to the signing of agreements between the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Government of Israel concerning the interim provisional stage, which is to be followed by a final stage with the cessation of the Israeli military occupation of all Palestinian and Arab lands occupied by Israel by force of arms in 1967. This means that the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory will continue until that stage, and that its danger and persistent evil practices will continue to endanger the livelihood and lives of the Palestinian people. This being the case, the International Labour Organization and the international community as a whole, represented by the United Nations and its specialized agencies, are still committed to fulfilment of their obligations under the resolutions adopted on the various aspects of the question of Palestine until such time as the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory is ended and the Palestinian people recover their national rights, in particular the right to self-determination and to establish an independent State on their land, with its capital in the Holy City of Jerusalem. For that reason, the provisions and resolutions of the Conferences of the International Labour Organization and the resulting missions to the occupied territories to establish the facts about the situation of labour and workers there, the holding of a special sitting and the establishment of a special committee to monitor implementation of the resolutions of those Conferences and the Recommendations of the Director-General derived from the views expressed by Member States in their statements, continue to be an important and fundamental necessity, an expression of the responsibility of the ILO to the Palestinian people until the complete cessation of the Israeli occupation of the Palestinian territory occupied by military force. In this connection, I should like to commend the ILO's technical assistance programmes for the building of an infrastructure for Palestinian society and I take this opportunity to urge the donor countries to speed up the delivering of their contributions to the Palestine Liberation Organization and the implementation of the projects proposed with a view establishing an infrastructure for Palestinian society, following its destruction by the Israeli military authorities during the years of occupation. I also urge the countries of the world and international and regional institutions capable of doing so to provide material and technical support to the Palestinian people At this stage there is an extremely urgent need for such vital support so that life can return to normal in our land.

I wish to extend warm thanks to the President and to everyone who has contributed to the success of this special setting for their constructive role in strengthening and protecting the national rights of the Palestinian people and establishing a just peace in our region and in the world as a whole.

Mr. BOUCAOURIS (speaking on behalf of the European Communities; Government delegate, Greece) – One more excellent Report by the Director-General and his staff on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories has been produced, with valuable information and well-balanced conclusions. On behalf of the European Union, I wish to thank them all and to congratulate them on their competence and perseverance.

As in the past, the parties directly involved have been cooperative over the preparation of the Report, although this year some facilities usually provided by the Israeli authorities were lacking, and the programme established by the latter did not include, as in previous years, meetings with some senior officials.

We are confident that, whatever difficulties lie in its path, the situation in the occupied Arab territories will continue to improve. The agreement between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) on Gaza-Jericho, signed in Cairo on 4 May this year, is tangible proof of that, and the European Union did not fail to welcome it. Tribute was paid to the determination of both sides not to allow extremist elements to place obstacles in the way of peace. The part played by the co-sponsors, the host country and others, in encouraging the continuation of bilateral contacts and negotiations was also acknowledged.

The agreement on Gaza-Jericho is an important step towards the full implementation of the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements, signed by Israel and the PLO in Washington on 13 September last year. The earlier the Declaration is implemented, the better. If a climate of mutual trust can be promoted, then the whole Middle East peace process will be on the right track.

The European Union, for its part, has reaffirmed its continuing commitment to the peace process by adopting a joint action on 19 April, intended to mobilize the political, economic and financial resources of the Union in support of a just, lasting and comprehensive peace. Two of its members are already taking part in the temporary international presence in Hebron, while it has confirmed its willingness to participate, at the request of the parties concerned, in the temporary international presence in Gaza and Jericho and monitoring of the elections.

As we all know, the Cairo agreement has yet to be fully implemented. Although security is of vital importance, prolonged curfews and closures of the occupied territories and of Jerusalem jeopardize the economic development of the territories and thus the establishment of an enduring peace; a peace which is furthermore threatened by the continuing settlement programme.

The Palestinians have also to do their own bit if they are to succeed. It is up to the Palestinian authorities to adopt the right policies conducive to investment and job creation. It is up to them to set the basis for a democratic society where labour rights are fully respected and trade unions play a major part in setting up labour legislation. The European Union urges the Palestinian labour movement to establish still closer contacts with the Histadrut and with international trade unions. We are confident that the ILO will continue to play a full role in this process.

We have reached a turning point in the Middle East peace process. Recent developments in the region can justify some optimism. The European Union hopes that, in the next year, this Conference can dispense with the special sitting on the occupied Arab territories and turn its attention to the scope for constructive engagement by the ILO in support of the search for peace.

Original Arabic: Mr. NIA (speaking on behalf of the Arab Maghreb Union; Government adviser, Algeria) I would like to take the opportunity offered by this special sitting of the Conference on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories to make a few remarks on this just cause, which still needs the support of the intentional community. A just cause to which the countries of the Arab Maghreb Union, on behalf of which I am speaking, attach great importance, like the other Arab countries and all the countries anxious to secure peace and justice throughout the world.

The Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements signed on 13 September 1993 in Washington was given due recognition at the time.

The hopes which it aroused were strengthened by the agreement of 4 May 1994, which opened up a period of transition for part of the occupied territories.

By setting up an autonomous entity on part of its national soil, the Palestinian people have achieved an initial victory, which we hope will be followed by other victories, until an independent Palestinian State is set up, with the holy city of El Qods as its capital.

We are convinced that a settlement of the Middle East problem can only be achieved if Israel withdraws from all the occupied Arab territories,including El Qods.

The happy developments we are witnessing and those the whole world is hoping for have not changed the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. We therefore greatly appreciate the excellent Report submitted to us and wish to pay tribute to Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, and to his colleagues for the serious work they have accomplished.

We observe that the economic hardship in which the people in the Arab occupied territories live – or rather eke out an existence – is made daily worse by administrative harassment, gratuitous bullying, restrictions on freedom of movement, arbitrary arrest, fines out of all proportion to wages and other collective punishments which should be condemned and are unjustified.

However we look at it, the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories is, to say the least, complex, difficult and worrying.

It calls for total, urgent and consistent solidarity on the part of the international community. This is a challenge the community must take up if it is to contribute to consolidating peace and achieving security in a region beset by terrible ordeals which have long been a blot on the conscience of the world.

Urgent action is required to lift the restrictions on the employment of Palestinian workers, to offer them protection and adequate social benefits, to put an end to the denial of their most fundamental rights and the injustices perpetrated against them.

We cannot but pay tribute to the heroic resistance of the people of the Golan, led by the workers, who regularly organize strikes and demonstrations to denounce the policy of fait accompli practised by the Israeli occupation authorities.

The economy of the Golan has been disrupted by the accelerated confiscation of land, the main source of wealth, the expansion of settlements, discrimination in the distribution of water and various measures which run counter to the elementary principles of international law.

The population of the occupied Arab territories needs effective protection. It is the duty of the international community to give it this protection. What is at stake is peace and security in this part of the world.

The International Labour Office is familiar with the situation of the workers in this region, as it has followed developments since 1978. Its assistance and that of the Organization are particularly necessary today.

The stage which is beginning now with the transitional period calls for increased, multiform assistance to the Palestinian people to enable it to set up and develop an effective administration, set up sound institutions and create a viable economy.

It is in the interests of peace to fulfil the aspirations of the Palestinians as soon as possible by creating jobs, by providing adequate social protection and by an active struggle against poverty.

More than ever before, this is a challenge to the international community. The ILO must continue to include the question of the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories on the agenda among its greatest and most urgent concerns.

Mr. OEDIYANTO (speaking on behalf of the Non-Aligned Countries; Government adviser, Indonesia) – It is a great pleasure for my delegation to address this special sitting concerning the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories on behalf of the Non-Aligned Countries. We consider the holding of the sitting to be very timely, since it is held against the background of some important events which will have lasting effects on the future of the territories and the region as a whole, in particular the situation of the workers there.

Before I proceed, permit me to express our deep gratitude and appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO for the Report on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories which he has comprehensively prepared and submitted to us. Our thanks are also due to his representatives who have successfully completed their fact-finding missions in the occupied territories.

At this point in time, we all witness that while the pace and movement in the peace process towards the achievement of a comprehensive, just and lasing peace in the Middle East based upon relevant Security Council resolutions and the principle of land for peace seemed to be adequate, it has failed so far to generate the momentum which could bring relief to the plight of workers in the occupied territories.

Regrettably, the occupying power has so far been reluctant to take the necessary measures toward the promotion of social and economic well-being for workers in the occupied Arab territories. We nevertheless fully concur with the Director-General's observation in his Report that a daunting task faces all the parties concerned, including of course the ILO, who are all duty bound to help create a situation conducive to the attainment of peace, stability and economic development in a region which, for almost three decades, has experienced foreign military occupation, turbulence and social and economic justice.

As the Report of the Director-General rightly shows, the general situation of the workers in the occupied territories to date remains far from satisfactory. For the greater part, this is due to the maintenance of stringent policies by the occupying power. Thus far, for example, the arbitrary practices and security restrictions affecting workers have not been eased, while the significant restrictions placed on the employment of Palestinian workers in Israel are being maintained.

It is much more regrettable to see that the overall labour situation in the occupied territories has further deteriorated as a result of the closure of territories, prolonged curfews and other restrictive measures. The Israeli Government's intention to apply a policy that would reduce to a minimum the number of Palestinian workers allowed to work in Israel, if applied, will only further worsen this invidious situation. If such a policy were to be applied, it would have dire consequences for the economy of the occupied Arab territories, as the economic survival of the territories depends largely, at least in the shorter term, on access to jobs in the occupying State.

In this connection, we strongly urge the occupying power, which deliberately created such economic dependency, to re-open its frontiers to Palestinian labour, at least until such time as the economy of the territories permits the absorption of the Palestinian workers into the local labour market. Despite that grim situation, I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to commend the agreement signed in Cairo by the PLO and the Israeli Government on 4 May 1994, which is to pave the way for the Palestinian authorities to take charge of their affairs in the social and economic domain.

In the same vein, we would also like to welcome the launching of a blueprint for the social development of the occupied Arab territories, prepared by the International Labour Organization at the request of President Yasser Arafat of Palestine, and contained in the Appendix to Part II of the Report of the Director-General, as a measure to help create a conducive environment to the attainment of stability and economic progress by the people in the occupied territories, based on democratic principles and social justice.

While welcoming the readiness of donor countries to provide a fund to meet the costs of running the new Palestinian national authority, it is the considered view of member countries of the movement that the fund must be disbursed immediately without any conditions attached, since such an arrangement is humiliating and represents a serious obstacle to the autonomy process which is so far taking place.

Before concluding my statement, on behalf of the Non-Aligned Countries, I should like to reiterate our unswerving and undiminished support for the just struggle of the Palestinian and Arab people for justice, particularly at this very critical point in the peace process.

Original Arabic: Mr. KHALIL (Minister of Social Affairs and Labour, Syrian Arab Republic) – For the second time, I should like to congratulate the President on the confidence that the Conference has placed in him by electing him to chair the 81st Session of the Conference, and we hope that the discussions will live up to our expectations.

Peace will never be achieved in our Arab region as long as the Arab people are deprived of the right to self-determination, and as long as there are violations of the human rights enshrined in international Conventions and the Constitution of the ILO and respected, regardless of a person's race, sex, religion, colour or political belief.

Israel is pursuing and intensifying its policy of discrimination, of expulsion, flying in the face of international law, of the charter of the United Nations, the Geneva agreements, United Nations resolutions and, in particular, the resolution of the International Labour Conference, No. IX, 1974, concerning the Policy of Discrimination, Racism and Violation of Trade Union Freedoms, and resolution II of 1980, concerning the Implications of Israeli Settlements in Palestine and Other Occupied Arab Territories.

All previous reports, including the one before us, confirm that the racist and inhumane practices perpetrated by Israel are being continued to the detriment of the rights of Arab workers, employers and other inhabitants in Palestine, the Golan and other occupied territories which shows very clearly that Israel is actively trying to change the demographic composition of Arab territories and wipe out the culture and national identity of the people living there and ensure that the majority are settlers.

We support what the Director-General has said in his Report, inter alia, in paragraphs 14, 103, 16, 21, 36, 61, 62, 72 and 78 on continuing repressive and unwarranted actions by Israel, and the expropriation of land proving the extension of its colonies by the Israeli regime since the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements was signed by its President and the Chairman of the PLO, not to mention the obscene crime of the slaughter at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron.

Israel is maintaining many kinds of restrictions on the movement of Arab inhabitants, depriving them of work and income and harming the economy of the region. Israel refuses to return social security contributions it has received from Arab workers. The Director-General's Report in paragraphs 94, 96, 97 and 98 on the Golan mentions the requisitioning of land, the establishment of settlers, the expropriation and monopolization of sources of water and pressure on inhabitants who can only contact families by using loudspeakers and measures which make it impossible for university students to find employment, thus forcing them to become part of the exodus (the indirect expulsion of Arab inhabitants being one element of Israeli policy).

The mission sent by the Director-General to the occupied territories should be applauded in view of its neutrality and objectivity. We have before us its grim account in the Director-General's Report, but we would like to suggest some amendments. Paragraphs 90 to 93 mention the indigenous Arab population or autochthonous Druze. I believe it should read Syrian Arab citizens, for this is in fact what they are.

In the same vein "territories" as used in particular in paragraphs 67 and 89, should be amended to read "occupied Arab territories".

Paragraph 60 mentions authorizing workers to return to their usual work in Israel to prevent "acts of terrorism". The actions of Arab workers are those of defence and should not be branded as terrorism.

Paragraph 107 says that the "settlement policy should be terminated". However, the Report, pursuant to resolution II of 1980 adopted by the International Labour Conference, should demand in no uncertain terms that this policy be ended.

As long as the territories remain under occupation, however many reports are made, however many missions are dispatched, and regardless of the quality of recommendations made, the situation will not improve and the recommendations will serve no practical purpose. However, it is important to come back to the idea of a special committee to discuss the Director-General's Report, along the lines of the Committee on Action Against Apartheid which was successful in helping to end apartheid in South Africa.

Not only are the Arabic countries in favour of this, support has also come from the non-aligned countries in its decision adopted at the Conference of Labour Ministers of Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries held in Tunis in 1990. This committee would not be used for propaganda but aim to ensure that there was a purposeful discussion of the annual Report of the Director-General. In themselves, special sittings do not allow for in-depth dialogue or debate. We have to limit ourselves simply to making statements, which precludes the possibility of any objective work being carried out. Regardless of the make-up or number of sittings of the committee we are proposing, it would at least ensure a follow-up to its own recommendations and those made by the mission.

We also call for the implementation of technical cooperation programmes to help Syrian Arab workers who are living under the Israeli occupation in the occupied Arab Golan. Furthermore, an ILO unit should be set up in the occupied Palestinian territories to monitor the situation of Arab workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. In the same way, the application of technical cooperation programmes to help Palestinian workers and employers, financed out of the ILO's budget, should be stepped up.

We have expressed our sincere hope for just and universal peace based on the principle of land for peace, international legitimacy and the United Nations Security Council resolutions. President Hafez Al-Assad has, on numerous occasions, stated that we have no preconditions except that the process should be taken seriously and be sincere. The Syrian Arab Republic will never stand in the way of peace. Those who do not want peace are the people who refuse to apply the Security Council resolutions, who continue to violate all international charters and resolutions and try to block all sincere initiatives aimed at ensuring peace.

The truth of the situation as described in the Appendix to Part II of the Director-General's Report serves as a graphic condemnation of Israel and its activities which are based on repression, racism and serious violations of human rights and international instruments. The Conference owes it to itself to take a firm stance and ensure that these crimes do not go unpunished. It is high time that the Conference adopted the much-needed resolutions sanctioning a member State which is failing to comply with resolutions and respect the principles of the International Labour Organization.

Original Arabic: Mr. KARA (Workers' delegate, Israel) – Thank you very much. I would like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this 81st Session of the International labour Conference. I hope that the work will be very fruitful in light of the important points on the agenda of this session of the Conference.

I will be very frank. I have decided to speak to you from this rostrum at this time in order to extend to you my greetings as well as the greetings of the Middle East as a whole. In the past we sought peace, and this long period led to negotiations. We reached that objective.

It is often said that a first step has to be made for a second step to follow. You know what a giant step forward toward peace between Israel and the PLO took place in August 1993 with the signing in Oslo of the agreement between the two, followed by a historic Declaration of Principles. These steps were rapidly followed, with the good will of the two parties in the past months, by the signing of the first agreement on autonomy on the West Bank and in the Gaza Strip.

During the second half of May of this year, we started to implement the agreement in Gaza and Jericho. Israel conferred on the PLO responsibility for this territory. But this is a very long process. The success of the agreements concerning Gaza and Jericho will guarantee on their own the success of the peace process. We, the representatives of many peoples, should all contribute to fostering the cause of peace.

This is what I wanted to tell you last year when I spoke to you from this rostrum about the prospects for peace. I said that we did not need to have a special session to examine the condition of workers on the West Bank in Gaza. Today we have the proof of this. But there are still some who cannot accept this, or who do not want to accept this new situation. It is not by chance that the countries which often speak out in favour of this special session are the same ones in which workers' rights are not always respected. Today I suggest that we do not waste any more time holding such special session, because they are sterile.

Today, a real step forward towards the objective of peace has been taken, and we should seek to strengthen the cause of peace. We should support the ILO's programmes to implement projects relating to conditions of work, social security and occupational trade unions on the West Bank and in Gaza instead of wasting our time.

Our Organization needs to meet its responsibilities in favour of peace in these regions. The workers of Palestine have to become organized, and their organizations have to become democratic. That is the only way to uphold the cause of the workers.

The Histadrut, since it represents workers in Israel, is entirely ready to contribute to the cause of peace as it has done in the past, sharing its experience with the trade unions in Palestine. This year we helped defend the interests of the workers in the region. We also provided some social protection to these workers, making available to them Arab lawyers to help those workers unable to go to their place in work because of the curfew. We raised funds for workers who were in need of financial assistance.

We still support flexible policies designed to permit these workers to have access to their places of work despite the fact that very often the territories are shut off. As we have done in the past, we are still ready today to open our international institute to these workers so that they are able to take courses and become informed of their rights. Cooperatives are very important for workers as well. Through cooperatives, they can work with employers and official organizations which are ready to conclude collective agreements, guaranteeing the workers' salaries and increasing their living standards. This contributes in turn to fostering the cause of peace.

Last year, we organized the first official meeting between officials of the Histadrut and the General Federations of Trade Unions of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Secretary-General of the Histadrut also participated, as well as the Secretary-Generals of the GFTUs. We covered questions concerning both organizations.

Today we can see that peace is coming to our region. For more than 40 years this region has been subjected to bloody wars, with very serious consequences, including much destruction and death. Today we need to rebuild the economic basis and infrastructure to support industry in this region, for only industry and work can ensure a worthy existence for all people and workers.

Once again, my I remind you that this situation requires the full participation of all those who are ready to promote the cause of peace at the international as well as the national level. On behalf of the Histadrut trade union in Israel, I would like to say that we are entirely ready to take up this task with you. God bless you.

Original Arabic: Mr. ELAMAWY (Minister of Manpower and Employment, Egypt) – In the name of God, the Compassionate and Merciful! Allow me at the outset to congratulate the President on his election to the presidency of the special sitting to discuss the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. I should also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for this important Report which reflects the recommendations and observations of the mission that was sent to Israel and the occupied Arab territories to investigate the situation of the workers in these territories.

The Middle East has recently witnessed historic and encouraging events representing the positive developments of the peace process. They began by the opening of the International Peace Conference on the Middle East in Madrid on October 30 1991, in accordance with Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. Then came the bilateral talks that followed this Conference: the signature of the Declaration of Principles on the Interim Self-Government Arrangements; and the important Cairo Agreement signed by Israel and the PLO regarding the implementation of the above-mentioned principles.

All these are positive developments that represent an important and fundamental step towards the achievement of a just and durable peace in the region for the welfare and security of its peoples.

It is unfortunate that despite these positive historic events that I have just mentioned, and in accordance with the Director-General's Report, the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories is still bad and has not improved. The year 1993 was another bad one from the social and economic point of view as a result of the extended curfew and the closure of the Israeli borders to Arab workers. Paragraph 103 of the Director-General's report reads: "Since the signing of the Declaration of Principles the Israeli authorities have reportedly stepped up the confiscation of Palestinian lands and the expansion of existing settlements and their infrastructures."

As a result of the settlement policy pursued by Israel in the occupied Arab territories, the natural characteristics of this part of the world as well as the demographic composition of this region have both changed dramatically. This is considered a violation of international law and international humanitarian law. The international community has repeatedly denounced the establishment of such settlements and expansion, together with the resulting duality in social and legal regimes and the consequent tension, injustice and violence. This confirms the necessity of putting an immediate and complete end to the settlement policy in the occupied Arab territories, taking into account the harmful impact on the citizens' rights in these territories.

The various departments of the ILO have undertaken several activities in favour of the workers of the occupied Arab territories; these were described in the Report of the Director-General who confirmed and emphasized that the best way for the ILO to serve the interests of the workers and employers in the occupied Arab territories is to provide them with technical assistance. The Report mentions that the complex conditions that have prevailed in the occupied Arab territories over the past two decades have hampered the achievement of this objective. However, the Director-General referred to the fact that the developments that took place between the Israelis and the Palestinians during the last quarter of 1993 augur well for the future and for the ILO's role in improving the conditions of the workers of the occupied Arab territories.

We would like to confirm what has been included in the Report of the Director-General with regard to the importance of coordinating the activities of the ILO as well as the governmental and non-governmental organizations that participate in the process of developing the Palestinian lands, particularly their close cooperation with the Palestinian Economic Council for Development and Reconstruction.

The historic and positive developments witnessed by the Middle East region lay further responsibilities on the ILO as well as the other international organizations in order to protect and to ensure the exercise of the fundamental rights and freedoms of the Palestinian workers of the occupied Arab territories and in order to respond to the needs of the Palestinian people on the technical, economic and social levels, by granting them assistance with the objective of achieving the respect of their rights and freedoms.

We reaffirm the importance of implementing the recommendations made by the Director-General in this Report and in previous ones. We also reiterate our adherence to the principle of equal treatment for Palestinian workers both at the workplace and as regards social insurance.

We fully support the peace process in the Middle East which is based on Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 as well as the principle of land for peace in order to establish just and comprehensive peace in the region, which is the main reason for the non-respect of workers' rights in the occupied Arab territories.

Mr. HILB (Employers' adviser, Israel) – First of all, I want to congratulate Mr. Gray on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference. My congratulations go also to the Vice-Presidents.

This is the fifth time in the past five years – and we expect the last one – that a special session is held within the annual session of the ILO Conference in order to discuss the report submitted by the ILO special mission to examine the situation of workers of the territories.

In the past years, particularly the last, events of major importance have taken place around the world especially in the Middle East bringing about historical developments in every aspect of Israel-Arab relations, most important of which is the agreement between Israel and the PLO which provides solutions to many problems which generated the conflict of many years between Israel and the Palestinians. It is highly regrettable that the ILO ignores these historical developments by continuing to hold a special session as if nothing has changed. We were of the opinion that this year in particular it was unnecessary to send a special mission by the ILO let alone hold this special session.

It is highly regrettable that the Organization has decided, despite the agreement signed with the PLO and the ongoing peace process, to nevertheless hold this session which has continually been used as a stage for attacks and talks against Israel in a matter which is essentially political and, in fact, has no bearing on and nothing to do with the goals and function of the ILO. I hope this year we have seen the last of these special sessions and that this issue would no longer be part of the ILO's Conference agenda which would enable the Organization to deal with subjects pertinent to its activities and focus on the reforms it has to carry out to maintain its relevance. It is well known that the number of workers from the territories employed in Israel has decreased in the last year. Undoubtedly, the agreement setting forth the Palestinian Autonomy signed between Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) will lead to the development of industrial plants within the Autonomy, thus creating new opportunities for its residents.

The Paris Agreement, which is an economic agreement between Israel and the Autonomy, includes a chapter on workers and labour between the Autonomy and Israel. In this chapter, the labour relations are regulated in general terms. Upon the establishment of the Autonomy, the relationship is not that of an occupying power, but that which exists between a country and an autonomous authority, thereby leading to varied economic activities including workers in both frameworks. Therefore, sending out a mission and holding a special debate on workers' rights has now become irrelevant, and lacks interest.

We as employers and representatives of the business sector strive for normalization in business and commercial ties with Palestinian industrial companies and businessmen. We are preparing ourselves for the developments and the new situation, essential to the welfare of the region and its residents, knowing that entrepreneurship and business development constitute a major factor in the region's development and bring people and nations closer together than any political activity. We are hopeful that the politicians will let the entrepreneurs, the businessmen and managers in the business sector do their work, the results of which will contribute to general prosperity in the region.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL GHAZAWY (Minister of Labour, Jordan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The delegation of the Kingdom of Jordan is proud to be attending this special session of our Conference being held in these august surroundings during the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We wish to discuss the position of the Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied territories, and we would like to express our appreciation to the Director-General of the ILO and his officials for the Report they have drafted.

Having followed daily the position in Palestine and the occupied territories, we share the preoccupation felt by the Director-General in the light of the findings by the special mission, namely the infringements of rights and liberties in this part of the world in 1993, a year which the mission characterizes as an unhappy one on the political and economic level. Perhaps we should point out that the economy of these regions is depressed and underdeveloped. Paragraph 18 of the mission's report that states "living and working conditions remain extremely bad and precarious. Furthermore, the human rights situation has not improved."

This report contains shocking testimony as to the precarious position of the inhabitants of these parts of the world, the trials and tribulations of workers and employers owing to actions by the occupying forces – the sealing off of areas, destruction of houses and restrictions on traffic – and the suffering inflicted by colonization and the acts of unending provocation by the settlers. All of this constitutes a permanent challenge to the peace process to which all Arabs aspire. Our wish is for a just and lasting peace in the region to regain the occupied Arab territories so that the people in this part of the world may enjoy, as do others, a true and wide-reaching peace based on social justice and international recognition, and lastly, so that we can dedicate our full efforts to construction and development.

I am sorry to say that these actions run contrary to the principles of the ILO, threatening to undermine the peace process. We must put a stop to this so that all the good offices may be successful in terms of respect for the rights of humans, whether they be employers or workers, in accordance with the principles of humanity to which we are all committed by reason of belonging to the ILO.

My country has always paid tribute to the activities of the ILO which has worked to eradicate apartheid in South Africa. We would like to appeal to the various bodies of this Organization to continue their efforts begun a number of years ago to improve the living conditions of workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied territories and to guarantee their rights and their freedoms as embodied in your Constitution.

We hope that these efforts will go hand in hand with the programme of technical assistance for the benefit of these workers, employers and other classes of people coping with colonization and oppression, who need social and economic organizations, in order to be able to resume their daily normal activities in tranquillity.

To conclude, I wish to appeal to our Organization to serve as the vanguard of international groups in order to defend these principles and affirm the truth stressed by the mission itself which said that the military occupation makes it impossible to enjoy civil and political liberties.

Original Chinese: Mr. HUANG (Workers' adviser, China) – Since we discussed the question of Palestine in this august forum last year, the Middle East situation has witnessed fundamental changes. The Middle East peace process has achieved historical breakthroughs and the decade-long Arab-Israeli conflict has come to an historical turning-point following the signing of the Palestinian and Israeli peace accord. On 4 May, the PLO Chairman, Yasser Arafat, and the Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin signed in Cairo the agreement on implementing the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements. Now the first group of Palestinian police has been deployed in the Gaza Strip. A new phase of practical implementation has begun for the Palestinian and Israeli peace accord. The Chinese trade unions and workers as a whole heartily rejoice at this encouraging development, resulting from the protracted struggles of the Palestinian workers and people. We hope that the workers and peoples of Palestine and Israel will really join hands and live in harmony to turn the land torn by war over the past 50 years into an oasis of peace in the future.

The issue of Palestine is the crux of the Middle Eastern question. Failure to settle this issue in a just and reasonable manner will not only impair peace and development in the Middle East, but also worldwide. The International Labour Office has made positive efforts for many years towards solving the Palestinian question by sending fact-finding teams to survey the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories and publishing their findings every year before the International Labour Conference. This has attracted worldwide attention. The ILO has also provided the occupied Arab territories with technical cooperation projects. We would like to voice our appreciation of the various efforts made by the ILO and also hope that the ILO will continue to provide assistance wherever possible in the forthcoming reconstruction of Palestine, so as to speed up its development process.

Of course, we should also notice that the mutual recognition of Palestine and Israel and the agreement concluded on implementing the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements is only the first step towards a comprehensive settlement of the Palestinian question. The Middle East peace process is still a tortuous one, and more reverses and setbacks will possibly be encountered. We hope that the Palestinian question will be settled in a just and reasonable way in accordance with relevant resolutions, Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 in particular. It is our sincere hope that the international community, the ILO and the parties concerned will contribute to achieving a just and a reasonable settlement of the Palestinian and the Middle Eastern question.

The Chinese workers and trade unions have always supported the just struggle of the Palestinian workers and people for the restoration of their legitimate rights. We will, as always, join hands with the workers and trade unions all over the world, especially in the Middle East, and make positive efforts for the early achievement of the comprehensive and just peace and stability in the Middle East.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAJANI (Employers' adviser, Jordan) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. The subject under consideration is fairly broad, and the time is very limited, so I will try to be very brief. Accordingly, I would like to start by greeting the President and all members of this Conference. I should also like to extend my heartfelt thanks to the Director-General for his comprehensive Report, and to the fact-finding mission for all the efforts they have deployed.

This special sitting, which members of the Israeli delegation have suggested should be abolished, is a declaration and reaffirmation of the just rights of the Palestinian workers in the occupied Arab territories. If these two delegates do not want to have this special sitting convened, they need only ask their Government to pursue the peace process in a sincere and dedicated manner, so that the occupied Arab territories can go back to their owners.

This annual Report comes at a time when the Arab-Israeli conflict stands on the threshold of peace. The two sponsors of the Madrid conference, namely the United States and Russia, undertook the sponsorship of the peace process instead of the United Nations, which is the appropriate international organization to establish such a peace.

Since the Madrid conference, which was sponsored by the two major powers in 1991, the ILO has issued four annual reports which come on top of a series of earlier reports, and which are written in a promising language when talking of the violation committed by a Member of this Organization, of trade union and human rights, confiscation of properties and prohibition of people from working. Actually, this member State is with us today celebrating and commemorating the 75th anniversary of the establishment of trade union freedom and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We may conclude that the Report of the Director-General and these other reports covers the violation of trade union freedom and human rights and the destruction of sources of income and work and takes us from the time before the Oslo agreement through to the massacre of the Palestinians praying in the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron, to the seige of Jerusalem and the creation of instability and chaos in the self-government area by the siege. This was a concerted operation to foil peace and to continue violating international instruments.

All this is to be found in the various reports: violations and aggressions. These reports are quite neutral; they merely hold a mirror to contemporary history and recount to the world the destruction perpetrated in this part of the world, and how the hand of Israel has brought about all this destruction and oppression. I believe that this denunciation by the world suffices.

The ILO and the different Members of this Organization have played a major role in eradicating apartheid and injustice in South Africa. We would express our congratulations on this victory scored over violation of human rights. The Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid has played a leading role in this field. We call upon the ILO Governing Body to establish a committee similar to that for South Africa, to follow up and monitor human rights until the Israeli role in the violation of trade union freedoms has come to an end.

The Arab countries have embarked on the peace process for the sake of peace, and not as a result of submission to oppression and aggression. The self-government area needs every support and assistance. Currently, the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) is building a humanitarian society out of the debris of destruction that has been brought about since 1967.

The courageous Jordanian declaration made by His Majesty King Hussein of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, needs your support. The historic link between Palestine and Jordan needs every support. We have to establish the potential to deal with Israel on an equal footing so that there will be no superior and no inferior. To achieve peace, we have to cooperate. If next year, the report we receive is similar, I will conclude that no improvement has been made. But we hope we will return to Jerusalem after 46 years of exile and violation of human rights.

Original Arabic: Mr. SAHBANI (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Today we are meeting as usual at this time of the year in order to consider the Palestinian cause,which has been a long-standing concern in the work of the ILO, an organization based on the principles of justice, equality and resistance against all forms of oppression and injustice, and whose Director-General we should thank, on behalf of all the workers of Tunisia and the Maghreb, for his excellent Report that he has put before us, which objectively reflects the economic and social situation in the occupied Arab territories.

The Palestinian cause and the occupied Arab territories are, for my country and for the Maghreb, a national cause. We have chosen the principle of unconditional support of the Palestinian people – a lofty slogan in daily practice, especially in the light of the conviction felt by the people of Palestine and the occupied territories and the ardour they display in their struggle, which takes various forms – from strikes, marches and demonstrations, to throwing stones and the intifada.

These are struggles inspired by the peoples' sincere conviction in the justice of their cause, as they stand up to the forces of occupation – a brutal occupation which came to a horrible climax with the Hebron massacre that shook the conscience of the world.

The Report of the Director-General maintained that these savage practices are being continued: freedoms are flouted, human rights are violated, u employment is rising, with spreading pauperization.

These trends are on the increase, because of the policy of occupation, machine-gunning of old persons, humiliation of Palestinian women and the stepping-up of settlement and confiscation of Arab land in Jerusalem and the Golan.

At a time when the ILO is reiterating the need to adopt humane labour standards respecting rights and prohibiting child labour, we see Palestinian children in the street because their houses are being destroyed, and they are being denied the right to education.

If the situation is not resolved in a radical manner with the Palestine Liberation Organization, the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, with a view to establishing a Palestinian State with its capital at El Qods, the entire region will remain an area of tension, far from the peace and stability we all long for.

We are convinced of the role of the ILO and its capacity for taking concrete action, especially at this time, when it is celebrating its 75th anniversary. Following the collapse of the apartheid system in South Africa, the Organization has remained a stronghold in every storm, steadfast in its defense of the principles of liberty and justice. All this prompts us today to insist together, firstly on maintaining a special sitting for the cause of Palestine as long as the occupation continues, and secondly on setting up a committee to follow up the situation of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and in the occupied Arab territories – an appeal made by the Conference of Labour Ministers of Non-aligned and other Developing Countries in Tunis in 1990. Thirdly, the technical assistance programmes financed by the ILO budget must be strengthened.

These are our proposals, which will continue to be made as long as no protection has been given to the workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied territories.

Mr. AUSMAN (Government delegate, Canada) – The Government of Canada has not participated in these special sittings before. I hope no one has interpreted this as a lack of interest in the subject, but rather as self-restraint, given the fact that much of what has been said, or what could be said on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, is usually spelled out very well in the Director-General's Report, as it is again this year.

We have also considered it inappropriate to focus the full attention of the universal multilateral technical body so consistently on the problems of one particular country and its neighbours.

This year, however, is different because we are encouraged by the tremendous progress towards peace and reconciliation which has been achieved over the past ten months.

We have also argued that the rights of the Palestinian workers can and should be protected and defended, using the existing panoply of international labour legislation.

Procedures for handling discrimination or injustices exist. The Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee on the Application of Standards, which is meeting during this Conference, are at our disposal, not to mention various special procedures which can be brought into play in very serious cases.

The full and proper use of this ILO machinery would not ensure that appropriate world attention is drawn to the cases of discrimination and poor employment practices in the occupied territories, but it would render exceptional measures such as the current special sitting unnecessary in the future.

Meanwhile, Canada is determined to do everything it can to support and assist all aspects of the Middle East peace process. We congratulate Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, which have both risked so much politically for peace and have engaged in an essential dialogue to that end. It is a slow and sometimes painful process, but it is now well launched and we believe it will succeed.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! May peace be upon you! With all pride, I would like to put on record a word of appreciation for the ILO in the light of the efforts that have been deployed in preparing this elaborate Report, prepared by a mission to investigate the social and economic conditions of the Palestinian workers, which is being discussed in a special sitting as an expression of the importance of the subject under consideration, and as being linked to the objectives of the Organization.

This sitting is being held in a year of celebration. This year we are commemorating the 75th anniversary of the ILO, while taking pride in its efforts in the service of the international community and the guaranteeing of trade union freedoms.

South Africa is also celebrating the end of oppression, injustice and apartheid after long years of suffering, with the support of the international community and the United Nations system, as well as the ILO. We are celebrating a year of peace, with the signature of the Peace Agreement between the Israelis and the Palestinians in order to reaffirm our desire for peace, and hoping that the other party shares that desire.

Apartheid, discrimination and injustice in working opportunities are some of the characteristics of the Israeli regime in Palestine and the occupied territories. What is the significance of peace if we do not pave the way for it.

When we repeated our call for convening this special sitting, it was because we fully and firmly believe that the principles and objectives of the ILO are also ours, and we are keen to implement these principles and objectives through the discussions we are having during this special sitting. So, we will support the continuation of such special sittings as long as violations are still being perpetrated.

Through the programme of assistance in Palestine implemented by the Federation of Employers, we are positively contributing to the alleviation of suffering and to increasing the level of productivity which will help to eradicate poverty in the region.

In conclusion and in the name of peace, and in the language of logic, I call upon Palestinian and Israeli employers to work together to overcome the negative aspects of the situation and to pave the way for their leaders and decision-makers to pursue their efforts which will eventually lead to the establishment of a solid economy, where all economic and intellectual assets will be able to be used.

I greet you all and I wish all those attending this special sitting every success. We hope that we will look into this situation in a better atmosphere next year.

Original Chinese: Mr. ZHANG WEI (Government adviser, China) – It is of great importance to continue the debate on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories at the current session of the ILO Conference, against the background of the conclusion of the Gaza/Jericho agreement between Palestine and Israel. The signing of the accord marks a breakthrough in the Middle East peace process, and represents an important step towards a fair and comprehensive peace in the Middle East and the harmonious coexistence of the Arab and Jewish peoples.

It has also laid a solid foundation for a thorough improvement of the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. The Chinese Government welcomes this development and appreciates the wise and pragmatic position adopted by the Palestinian and Israeli leaders. This breakthrough is the outcome of the protracted heroic struggle waged by the people of Palestine and other Arab countries.

It can also be attributed to the support given by various countries, peoples and international organizations, including the ILO, to the just cause of the Arab people and to the efforts to promote the Middle East peace process. The debate on the workers' situation in the occupied territories is a positive contribution to this end.

However, one should also be aware that the attainment of a comprehensive and fair settlement of the Middle Eastern question in the occupied territories remains an arduous task which calls for continued efforts by the parties concerned, including the international community. First of all, there is still a long way to go before the relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions, 242 and 338 in particular, are genuinely implemented.

The Chinese Government maintains that the occupied Arab territories should be returned and the legitimate national rights of the Palestinian people restored. In the meantime, the sovereignty and security of all Middle Eastern countries, including Israel, should be respected and guaranteed.

We hope that both the Arab and Israeli sides will continue to adopt a flexible, pragmatic and constructive approach to removing the obstacles through dialogue, so as to bring about an all-round success in the Arab/Israeli peace talks at the earliest possible date.

The workers of the occupied Arab territories have been denied a fundamental improvement in their conditions. They are still faced with a threat to the safety of their person, lack of guarantees for their basic rights, discrimination, unemployment and unjust treatment.

The Chinese Government is profoundly concerned at the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. We would ask the Israeli Government to do all in its power to improve the working and living conditions of the workers in the occupied territories and guarantee their legitimate rights and interests while striving for a political settlement of the Middle East question.

There are still many obstacles and risks inherent in implementation of the agreement between Israel and Palestine and the attainment of overall peace in the Middle East. The Hebron massacre is a case in point. The Chinese Government strongly condemns such violence and opposes all forms of terrorism. This incident has once again demonstrated the urgency of a fair and reasonable settlement of the Palestinian question, for, in the absence of such a settlement, there will be no tranquillity in the Middle East region and, consequently, no fundamental improvement in the workers' situation in the occupied territories. We call on the Israeli authorities and other parties concerned to take all the necessary measures to stop such violence so as to ensure the safety of the lives and property of the people there.

The Chinese Government and people have always supported the just struggle of the Palestinian people and have actively supported and promoted the settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute through peaceful negotiations. True, the road of peace negotiations will be a tortuous one, but we believe that only negotiations can lead to a comprehensive and just peace in the Middle East and a fundamental improvement of the situation of workers in the occupied territories. The Chinese Government and people will continue to support the just cause of the Palestinian people and the Arab peoples and promote the Middle East peace process. We also offer our assistance to the Palestinian people in the rehabilitation of their homeland.

We ask the ILO to spare no effort and to continue its concern for the just cause of the Palestinian people and to make its contribution to the Middle East peace process. We suggest that the Governing Body authorize the Director-General to continue to dispatch fact-finding missions to learn about the workers' situation in the occupied territories and to publish their findings and formulate and implement specific technical assistance programmes to help ensure their rights and improve their situation in such fields as employment, and training.

Mrs. PEDERSEN (Workers' delegate, Norway) – Allow me to congratulate the President on his election. We are happy he is present here today.

Once again, we are debating the situation in the occupied territories based on this year's Report of the ILO Director-General.

In my statement to the special sitting in 1993, I strongly emphasized the necessity of dialogue between the Israelis and the Palestinians. I maintained that dialogue would be important as a step forward, as it would create a basis for cooperation for improving living and working conditions and that mutual recognition by dialogue would contribute to diminished tension and thus to better prospects for peace.

Since then, important results have been achieved. Progress in the peace process has come to an extent that hardly anyone believed was possible last June. We are all happy that there is agreement on mutual recognition between the Israeli Government and the PLO, and that the agreement and the Declaration of Principles have started to yield results.

Now, in 1994, and this time I speak on behalf of all the Nordic trade unions, we once again wish to emphasize the role and the importance of the ILO for the progress needed. The dialogue must not be allowed to slow down. It must be extended to all groups in Israeli and Palestinian society.

The process has suffered setbacks, of which the Hebron massacre was the most serious. But the peace process was not thrown off the track. And less than a month ago we witnessed the first concrete results of the Declaration of Principles. The Palestinians took over Gaza and Jericho and the Israeli army has been substituted by a Palestinian police force.

Now it is equally important to continue promoting dialogue, in order to continue to reduce tension and fear and in order to build more confidence and trust between the two populations. In this process the Israeli and Palestinian trade union movements have an important obligation and opportunity. Theirs is the fundamental task of creating peace.

Another equally important task is to rebuild Palestinian society, structurally and economically. But there is limited time. I note that the donor countries in Paris last week concluded that urgent steps are necessary to create visible results immediately. However, this must urgently lead to concrete action if public opinion in Gaza and the West Bank is to continue to believe in the process. The international community must act and must keep its promises to the Palestinian people as well as to the Israelis.

Investment is needed to create employment. Living conditions must be improved by creating jobs for the population. A recent report by the Norwegian Institute of Applied Social Research (FAFO), a foundation established by the Norwegian trade union movement, pursues its 1992 survey mentioned in the Report of the Director-General by stating that Gaza is an occupational time bomb. If investments, job-creation measures and income policies are not effected very shortly, social conditions might destroy the peace process. A first step could be to solve the problems of Palestinians who have lost their working permission in Israel.

Secondly, there is a need for immediate action to create new infrastructures, a health care system and social structures to meet the basic needs of the population.

However, the successful building of a democratic structure is equally important. It is not included in the Report before us, but as you probably know, Norway and also the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions have long-standing relations with the Palestinians and the Israelis and their organizations. Therefore my organization directly, and in cooperation with the ICFTU, has stepped up our support to the Palestinian Trade Union Federation's branches in Gaza and on the West Bank for the building of a strong, viable trade union movement, which is of fundamental importance to build a democratic society.

In the building of a democratic Palestinian structure, it is of importance to develop a legislative framework that protects three-way cooperation and trade union rights.

With reference to the Report of the ILO Director-General, I stress what we see as a longer-term aim, that is the eventual creation of a Palestinian State, based on democratic principles and social justice. Equally important, the basic security interests of Israel must be safeguarded. These are objectives which cannot be fulfilled without deeper understanding between the Israelis and the Palestinians. The Histadrut and the Palestine Trade Union Federation will have an important role to play in this process. Increased dialogue between these organizations will be of crucial importance. Cooperation between workers' organizations is vitally necessary in the new situation in order to secure the future new alignment between Israel and Palestine.

ILO, governments, trade unions and employers' organizations – we all have a duty to contribute. Let us do just that.

Mr. LAGUESMA (Government delegate, Philippines) – First of all, the delegation of the Philippines wishes to convey its full appreciation to the Director-General for the excellent Report that has been prepared on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories. The Report provides us with an update, particularly on the extent to which effect has been given to the recommendation made by the Director-General, specifically, that submitted to the 80th Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are also elated by the fact that the representatives of the Director-General were given the necessary facilities for their meetings with government authorities, workers' and employers' representatives, both in Israel and the occupied Arab territories. Such a magnificent and much-needed display of cooperation and assistance are indeed a welcome and positive development that contributed immensely to the success of the mission. We likewise appreciate the fact that all the meetings and discussions that took place were marked by a spirit of deep mutual confidence and respect.

A number of significant events have taken place in the occupied Arab territories and on the international scene, including the signing of the agreement on 4 May 1994, which will impact on the future of the territories themselves and the region as a whole. There is every reason, therefore, to be optimistic that the future of the region will be characterized by mutual respect and a spirit of dialogue, considering all the efforts being accepted by the affected and concerned sectors and authorities.

During the special sitting here last year our delegation had the opportunity to participate and to express our support and endorsement of the initiatives being undertaken by the ILO to improve the well-being of the workers in the occupied Arab territories. We wish to reiterate such support, for we believe that during this delicate and complex transitional period the ILO has to continue with its efforts, particularly in the area of technical cooperation where its role is expected to assume new and different dimensions and importance.

As more and more responsibilities covering such fields as education, culture, health and social welfare are transferred to the Palestinians, ILO activities in these areas should be enhanced and carried out in close collaboration with the relevant authorities.

In this connection, we find particularly commendable and relevant the ILO mission's report entitled Capacity-building for social development: A programme of action for transition in the occupied Palestinian territories. The Philippine delegation welcomes with appreciation this programme, which comprises some 30 projects and which has been evolved in close coordination and interaction with the concerned parties. The seven components of the proposed programme, namely labour administration, industrial relations, employment creation, vocational training, social security, equality of opportunity for women and social and labour statistics, would indeed go a long way towards promoting and ensuring the social and economic viability of the Palestinian territories, the future relations between these territories and Israel, and eventually, to the stability of the region as a whole. We look forward, therefore, to the programme's immediate implementation.

It cannot be disputed that a difficult and daunting task lies ahead for all the parties mentioned in Part II of the Director-General's Report, including the ILO. We believe, however, that the ILO, with its experience and special competence in the social and economic fields, will be able to contribute and assist the process to a large extent. The ILO's efforts should, however, be complimented by all who cherish and adhere to the principle of social justice in the world of labour and employment.

Finally, we express the profound hope that the obstacles and setbacks to the peace process can be overcome. The reign of peace would result in the much awaited political stability, thereby paving the way for the establishment of democratic institutions that can ensure the confidence and the stability that are vital ingredients for economic activities and investments. We are certain that this would ultimately rebound to the economic and social good of the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Original French: Mr. DUNANT (Government adviser, Switzerland) – To start with I would like to express my congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO on his Report on the situation of the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

As usual the Report is a model of objectivity and precision which makes it indispensable to follow it from close quarters, a situation that is developing and changes from day to day. This I believe reflects considerable improvements in relations between Israel and the PLO since last year's Conference. However, the report also reveals the harsh living conditions of the inhabitants of the occupied territories, which continue to be all-pervasive as before.

We nevertheless believe that recent developments should be viewed as highly positive and encouraging, since they can only improve the daily life of these people who have lived in adversity for so many years.

From a bilateral point of view and through international organizations, Switzerland supports all measures favourable to normalizing the situation and improving the living conditions. In this regard, we give our total support as far as the recommendations by the Director-General are concerned and the project that the ILO is working out for the benefit of the Palestinian people.

Progress in a political situation which remained paralyzed for a number of years as we know is an arduous task. It would be utopian to think that the living conditions in the territories, which are currently autonomous, or those which will ultimately become so, will attain perfection from one day to the next. In the light of the signals we have noted these past months, and the will expressed by all parties in arriving at a solution, one could ask whether holding a special sitting of the Conference on this topic next year is warranted. The Swiss delegation would regard a negative reply to this question as recognition of the efforts undertaken so far, as well as encouragement to continue working in the future to bring about total normalization of the situation.

Original Farsi: Mr. GHEITASI (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – First of all, I should like to join with the preceding speakers in congratulating the President and Vice-Presidents on their election to steer the deliberations of this Conference. I am sure they will continue to preside over the debate of this special sitting with great wisdom.

We should like to convey our gratitude to the International Labour Organization and our appreciation for efforts that have been deployed in drawing up the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. However, we reproach the Office for having failed to mention certain aspects of the suffering endured by the workers in Palestine, such as imprisonment, exorbitant taxes, the closing of trades and businesses, and arbitrary acts of terrorism to which trade unions are subjected in the occupied Arab territories.

We are witnessing a shameful tragedy, an oppression against an entire people by a power which does not acknowledge basic rights, which pays no heed to justice, which has made violence its law and which has colonized the territory of others and confiscated property from its rightful owners.

There is no doubt that we are witnessing a plot against an oppressed people: and that there is a type of humiliating cooperation between the parties in question. The Palestinian people are anxiously awaiting the triumph of a just cause and an end to international Zionism.

Paragraph 16 in the Report of the Director-General refers to the massacre of Palestinians praying at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron. This is yet another example of the savagery of abject criminals.

This violence is totally unacceptable: can there be any crimes worse than these? The Zionist entity continues to occupy the territory of others.

The faithful are kidnapped from their homes. The Israelis want to undermine totally the confidence of the resistants so that they negotiate with the Zionists to put an end to the fighting. Paragraph 15 in the Report of the Director-General states that settlers have recently attacked Arab villages, burning houses and cars or harassing or killing inhabitants.

On behalf of the trade unions of the Islamic Republic of Iran, we should like to inform you that we support the Palestinian people: we support their noble objectives – objectives which are opposed to Zionism and which have been proclaimed by the Imam Khomeini who has declared that resistance must continue until Zionism disappears. These objectives must illuminate the path of all those striving for peace.

We shall continue to do everything we can in order to support the Palestinian resistance and we pay tribute to the sacrifices of the Palestinians.

The only way to free the Palestinians from these criminals is to harness all our energies and draw upon all our resources to fight against Zionism; once again, we declare that international aggressors, in particular the Zionist entity, should realize that the oppressed Palestinian people will continue their intifada, supported by the other oppressed peoples of the world, until their final victory is assured and until they are able to live in dignity and in freedom.

We know full well that the United States was behind the Gaza-Jericho agreement. However, we also know that it is at the head of the plot against the oppressed and the first country supporting the Zionist entity which is occupying the territory so dear to us. The United States has adopted inhumane measures in many areas throughout the world, in particular in Palestine. But we will not take all this trickery and deceitfulness lying down; we will challenge the United States, the mother of all vice in this century.

This country is negotiating with the oppressive power. These negotiations will only serve to squander the resources of the Jihad, the resistance and lead to more sacrifice.

In concluding, we firmly condemn once again the criminal acts perpetuated by the Zionist entity against the Palestinians and the Palestinian workers. As a representative of the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I should like to tell you that this illegitimate child – and we are referring to Israel – will give us back the land; we shall return to Palestine when we have but one heart and one voice; we shall return when the sun rises to dissolve the dark shadows of the night. Yes, we shall return. We shall lay waste the enemy and make the land which is so dear to us the graveyard of the Zionist entity.

Original Arabic: Mr. RASSOUL (representative, Arab Labour Organization) – I should like first of all to congratulate the President on his election as President of this special sitting.

The Arab Labour Organization, which I represent at this special sitting and which defends the rights of the Arab workers in general and in the occupied Arab territories, would like to express its deep appreciation to the Director-General and to the fact-finding mission which prepares the detailed report which could be added to the previous reports as further evidence of the continued policies pursued by Israel in these occupied territories.

We as an Arab group have a number of reservations as to the terminologies and definitions used in this report. However, we are not going to dwell on these points, but instead will give the Director-General a written report in this regard.

I will deal with the most prominent violations registered by the mission this year, which can be summarized as follows: the Israeli authorities' continued lack of respect of the right of the Palestinian people to live and to prosper. The Israeli authorities have continued to incarcerate without any trial thousands of Palestinian citizens, which includes a large number of workers. They also continue to confiscate land and sources of water while adding to settlements in the occupied Arab territories, which leads to deteriorating living standards as a result of the occupation and the military presence.

The year 1993 was described by the mission as a bad year from the economic and social standpoint. With regard to the current year, the mission described the suffering of the Palestinian workers as a result of the seige, and the collective sanctions that are being imposed on them and which are in violation of international law and human rights and in full contradiction with the provisions that justify such sanctions.

The abolition of work permits as mentioned by the mission is one of the practices that infringe on the rights of Palestinian workers. In addition, there is the continued psychological instability felt by these workers. Their sufferings also include families who depend on the income of those workers who are now unemployed. In short, as stated in paragraph 15 of the mission's report, "The aspirations for peace, stability and security have been offset by the uncertainty of the future".

Settlement policy and its contradiction with international instruments will require long hours of discussion. Above all it is aimed at changing the demographic composition of the region's inhabitants. Such policies must be halted before undertaking negotiations in this regard. Moreover, there are the provocations against the people, a number of them, with which all of us here are familiar. I would like to remind you of the crime perpetrated by the settlers in the Hebron Mosque during last Ramadan.

The self-government arrangement is an important transitional step toward the final goal, that of establishing the Palestinian State with Jerusalem as its capital. We therefore call upon the International Labour Organization to pursue its efforts until the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people are restored, as a result of their lengthy struggle, and we ask the ILO to help the social partners. We also invite it to implement this programme using its own or extrabudgetary resources.

We call upon the international community to support the Palestinian people at this critical stage.

We call upon the Governing Body to seriously consider Recommendations to be submitted to the next ILO conference to establish a special committee on assistance to Palestinian workers.

We are anxiously looking forward to the admission of the Palestinian delegation to the ILO conference.

Mr. BARAK (Government delegate, Israel) – As this is the first time my delegation has had to address the plenary, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the President most warmly on his well-deserved election. I would at the same time like to congratulate the Vice-Presidents on their election. I now wish to turn to the special sitting itself.

From the very first, Israel was opposed to the holding of a sitting dedicated exclusively to only one of the myriad of problems that confront the International Labour Conference. It was always clear that the decision to conduct this sitting was based on purely political grounds and constituted an unjustified singling out of Israel. Nevertheless, until now we have – although reluctantly – tolerated this discriminatory procedure. Now, however, it has become totally inappropriate. Everybody knows the great breakthrough that occurred less than a year ago in relations between Israel and the Palestinians. Last September, Israel and the PLO signed a declaration of principles in which we agreed on the basic conditions of interim self-government arrangements in the Gaza district, the Jericho area and also the rest of the West Bank. Since then, a further detailed agreement was signed on 4 May between Israel and the PLO on the initial application of this principle in Gaza and Jericho. Implementation of this second agreement has already commenced, and Israel has withdrawn from these two areas accordingly. Discussions will soon start on the further application of the principles contained in the declaration of principles to the rest of the West Bank. These momentous changes have opened a completely new era in the history of the Middle East. It has long been acknowledged in many other international conferences. Both the General Assembly of the United Nations and the Human Rights Commission welcomed the peace process virtually by consensus. In the recent World Health Assembly, too, an entirely positive and forward-looking attitude prevailed. In all these international bodies, awareness was shown that the divisive and confrontational politics of the past were no longer appropriate. And yet here, at the International Labour Conference, we are continuing with past procedures as though nothing had happened. It is regrettable that the International Labour Conference has chosen to perpetuate a practice which is in itself a symbol of the old politics, instead of turning a completely new page. I would like to express the wish that our Organization will address itself to the new reality and abolish the special sitting. I hope and believe that this will be its final session.

Another unnecessary anachronism is the Director-General's annual Report on the territories in its present form. If there is any value in a report at all, it would have to be one which surveyed the present needs of the Palestinian workers and made concrete recommendations to the Palestinian authorities and to the ILO about steps that could be taken to assist the Palestinians in the field of labour. Again, regrettably, the structure of the present Report is based on previous models, instead of reflecting the new situation. In fact, out of 67 pages only seven deal with this fundamental aspect. What then should the role of the ILO be in this changed international environment? The answer surely is that this Organization, along with other international bodies, should devote itself to furthering in any way it can the ongoing peace process between Israel and the Palestinians. We are very happy that an initial survey has already been carried out by the ILO experts to develop projects in the field of labour in the territories. This needs a follow up by all those concerned, so that specific programmes of technical assistance can be elaborated and implemented. Continued work along these lines would be of far greater value than the repetition of the sterile exercises of the past. We very much hope that next year discussions of the Middle East will be devoted solely to constructive comments on what should be done in this regard.

It is true that many of the problems have still not been resolved. Situations of such complexity cannot be resolved overnight. Meanwhile, what we expect from the international community is that it should assist in ending old animosities and not inflame them and keep them alive. Let us hope therefore that it will not be long before the Middle East conflict is forgotten and that we can all work together for our mutual benefit. We very much hope that, in this endeavour, the ILO will have an important role to play.

Original Russian: Mr. BORSHCHEVSKY (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – the Russian Federation in its capacity as a co-sponsor of the Middle East peace process has consistently favoured a just settlement corresponding to the interests of all the parties concerned. Our concrete actions toward this end are well known. I should like especially to mention the importance of the visit to Moscow in April of this year by the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization, Mr. Arafat and the Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. Rabin.

The Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements which was signed in Washington in September 1993 and the Cairo Agreement concerning Gaza and Jericho have significantly changed the situation. The main task at present is the successful implementation of the Israeli-Palestinian agreement and the step-by-step progression toward a general and just Middle East settlement which should follow.

At the same time, we do not believe we should be over-optimistic about the actual situation. The possibility still exists that extremist forces may attempt to complicate the process at any time. We should continuously and energetically support the peace process. This support should be given by participants from within and outside the region. This context is also important to bear in mind when considering the activities of the International Labour Organization in the region. The Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories makes it possible to view and assess the problem most objectively. The Report once again convincingly highlights the obvious need to solve the urgent social and economic problems in the occupied territories, where, as the authors of the Report point out, the administrative, police and military structures set up since 1967 remain essentially the same.

The Report provides useful information in the chapters on the economy and labour markets, on the working conditions of the Arab population in Israel and on the situation of trade unions and the situation on the Golan Heights. We support the corresponding conclusions of the Report. We would like especially to mention the chapter on the effects of Israeli settlements on the lives of Arab workers in the occupied territories. The Russian Federation has repeatedly reaffirmed its position on the illegality of building new settlements.

We should again like to repeat that the Russian Federation supports the basic directions of the action programme of the ILO in the occupied Arab territories. The priority and substance of the ILO's involvement in the Middle East should in a practical and effective way take into account the course of the political settlement of the conflict.

This, inter alia, relates to considering at the annual sessions of the International Labour Conference the Report of the Director-General on the situation of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. We share the point of view of those delegations which have already stated today from this rostrum that once the Arab-Israel conflict is truly on its way to being settled, this will create a positive atmosphere for a review of the special plenary meetings on this subject.

Concluding my address, I should like to point out that we highly appreciate the mission of the ILO in the region. We hope that the conclusions and recommendations contained in the Report which is now under consideration will be reflected in practice and will also positively influence the situation in the occupied territories.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Mr. SKOGMO (Government delegate, Norway) – Since last year's special sitting on this issue, the peace process in the Middle East has taken important steps forward. We have seen the breakthrough achieved in Oslo, the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements signed by Israel and the PLO in Washington on 13 September 1993 and the agreement on Palestinian self-rule in the Gaza Strip and Jericho signed in Cairo on 4 May this year. Israel and the PLO have recognized each other and are now engaged in a process of establishing autonomy in the Gaza Strip and Jericho. A procedure has been established for direct talks on future steps.

I would like to join with previous speakers who have congratulated Israel and the PLO on these important steps forward. We look forward to seeing free and democratic elections for the Council later this summer.

But we have just seen the start of a long voyage towards full peace in the Middle East.

On the political scene, both parties have internal problems. The agreements between Israel and the PLO face opposition on both sides. There is a need for early and tangible progress to show that peace benefits all people, that the peace process offers a better future than continued violence and political stalemate.

There are also important economic and social challenges. The Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories demonstrates the great challenges faced by the parties and by those of us who want to support the peace process. If we do not manage to solve the problems caused by unemployment and deteriorating living conditions it would be difficult to consolidate the process towards lasting peace.

Before we can agree on steps to improve the situation and a plan of action, we need certain basic facts. Norway has therefore sponsored a survey on living conditions, which was carried out by the Norwegian research institute (FAFO) in 1992, a study which is referred to several times in the Director-General's Report. The FAFO study found that in the West Bank only 50 per cent of men between the ages of 20 and 59 worked full time, while the corresponding number in Gaza was only 28 per cent. The FAFO survey also reports, in spite of this fact, that the wages most of them earned in Israel were by far the most frequent source of household income.

In the Director-General's Report it is observed that most of the salaried employment within the territories are in public services provided by the Israeli Civil Administration and by UNRWA. However, the Israeli authorities suspended the payment of salaries to the civil administration as of 1 June and the Palestinian Interim Self-Government Authority is consequently facing an immediate need for funds. The concern that the Government of Israel for security and other reasons will apply a policy that would reduce to a minimum the number of Palestinian workers permitted to work in Israel is also reflected in the Report. In the short term, unemployment may therefore increase rather than diminish. Policies that will contribute to investment and job creation in the territories are thus of the utmost importance to secure a basic level of social protection for workers and for the Palestinian population in general.

A forward-looking approach is now needed to support the peace process. We must examine what the ILO and its constituents can do to support positive development in Gaza and on the West Bank. The ILO can play an important part in the building of democratic institutions and in the development of the labour and social sectors. Norway will give its full support to the ILO recommendations mentioned in the Report and will urge the Director-General, in cooperation with other international agencies, to continue the work on examining the needs of the territories.

Norway's role as facilitator in the negotiations between Israel and the PLO should be well known. We remain committed to supporting the peace process.

Given the progress achieved during the last year, Norway trusts that this will be the last special sitting of the International Labour Conference on this issue. We are, in principle, not in favour of such sittings on any subject. In our view, complaints against and breaches of ILO Conventions should be considered in the committees designed to deal with such matters – the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

The ILO should now adopt a forward-looking approach to the situation on the West Bank and in Gaza. We should concentrate our attention on how we can strengthen the capabilities for Palestinian self-rule in the areas covered by the peace agreements now concluded. The ILO should concentrate its discussion and resources on programmes and projects designed to help the workers of Gaza and the West Bank. This would be the ILO's most important contribution to bringing prosperity and peace to a region that has suffered so much during the past decades.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – These last few years, I have taken the floor from the rostrum at this special sitting essentially to express my hope for peace in this part of the world. Without peace, it is not possible to envisage economic development and consequently social development and employment.

This year, we have had the satisfaction of witnessing events of considerable scope that offer great hope for the future, and which lead us to believe that the peace, so long desired, may progressively take root in this part of the world.

We know that these efforts for peace are fragile and that a durable and lasting peace also presupposes scope for economic development and job creation.

If the men and women, and especially the young people, of these territories cannot find a productive job, there is reason to fear that they will take refuge in escalating violence.

Consequently, I think I can speak on behalf of the employers of this Conference, when I say that we think it essential that the ILO be present, at this point in time, and forcibly in this part of the world.

And you will, of course, allow me to think in particular of the organizations that are trying to bring together the new or recent undertakings which are being set up in these regions.

I would now like to express my satisfaction at the work begun, particularly by the various preparatory missions, including the employers' services, to assess the position in the Arab occupied territories from the employers' point of view. This applies in particular to specific activities such as seminars organized under the auspices of the ILO for the chambers of commerce now representing the local employers in Gaza, Naplus and Hebron, and to support the Federation of Palestine Chambers of Commerce which is trying to bring all these activities under its wing, and take a step in the direction of establishing an employers' organization. There are three lines of action I would suggest for the ILO in the promotion of undertakings. It is first necessary to set up an adequate infrastructure to encourage and facilitate the creation of new undertakings. Here, I am thinking not of just the material infrastructure but also of institutions and legislation to favour the development of undertakings.

We then have to develop and modernize the vocational training system, which exists already and is fairly well advanced, but must be brought into line with the new conditions prevalent in the region.

Finally, it is important to help strengthen the chambers of commerce and federations so that they become more representative and defend the employers' interests nationally and internationally; and also so that they can better maintain relations with the regional and international organizations and obtain services and assistance for their members.

I think that the time of speeches and statements is over. We now come to the time for specific action and I am sure that, in the fields of special interest to us, the International Labour Organization will play a very effective role in ensuring, in this part of the world, in the growth of productive employment which will, I think, make an immense contribution to the establishment of peace in the region.

Original French: Mr. ZANOU (Government delegate, Benin) – On behalf of my country, Benin, and as coordinator of the African group, and also on my own behalf, I should like to congratulate the President and thank the ILO Director-General for his Report.

I note with satisfaction the efforts made by the international community, and especially by the ILO, on behalf of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

However, given the difficult social situation unfortunately prevailing in this region, we do hope that a final and appropriate solution will be achieved for the peoples concerned.

As you know, violence and war are the cause of poverty, suffering and misery for human communities. The ILO is therefore right in ensuring that its ideals of peace and social justice meet the expectations of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

I appeal to all peace-loving peoples to strengthen their efforts to improve living and working conditions of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

Original German: Mr. MELAS (Government delegate, Austria) – For many years now, the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories has been on our agenda. Since the last International Labour Conference last year, the political position has changed at a breathtaking pace. Without going into details concerning the signing of the Declaration of Principles between the PLO and Israel in September 1993, the Cairo Agreement in May of the same year or the first steps towards its implementation, I am convinced that the goodwill thereby generated and the actual improvements in the region offer a unique chance to meet the social and labour requirements of the Palestinian people. Since we have decided once more to hold yet another special sitting at this session, I would like to take this opportunity to express our sincere hope for and our confidence in the peace process.

The efforts made to improve the position of workers in the occupied territories call for the serious consideration of difficult problems.

One essential step towards the effective implementation of the social rights of the Palestinians is the setting up of a working labour administration and free and independent workers' and employers' organizations. For many years, Austria has affirmed that it would be valuable in this context to have reinforced cooperation between Palestinian trade unions and the Histadrut. The new situation in the occupied territories has laid the foundations for a strong engagement of the international community in order to stabilize, create or develop the necessary structures. We congratulate the ILO for its important contribution to this process. At the same time, we would like to stress the importance of continued cooperation and support for the Palestinian and Israeli authorities in such action.

Although we have yet to confront a large number of problems both political and practical, we sincerely hope that the strengthening of the peace process and the improvement of the social situation will make it possible for us next year to have no special sitting and no special procedure.

Original Arabic: Mr. BAHIJ (Workers' adviser, Morocco) – I should like to take the opportunity of this special sitting on Palestine to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and the Director-General, Mr Michel Hansenne, on his Report describing the tragic living conditions of the Palestinian workers and people in the occupied Arab territories, conditions of oppression and subjugation in which innocent children, women and old people are being killed every day.

The entire world followed with great hopes the signing of the peace agreement between Israel and the PLO last year in Washington. We thought that the peace process would bring an end to the sufferings of the Palestinian people which began with the invasion of their territory and the usurpation of their legitimate and natural rights by Israel.

We would have liked to see the peace process bringing an end to the Palestinian problem and extending also to other fronts so as to end the occupation of the Syrian Golan Heights, South Lebanon and Jordanian territory. Unfortunately, this hope has not been realized as quickly as we would have wished. On the contrary, Israeli oppression has been extended to places of worship such as the Ibrahimi Mosque, where the terrible massacre of worshippers took place before the eyes of the international community.

Surely these barbaric actions are incompatible with the peace process. The Palestinian people and their historical leaders in the Palestine Liberation Organization have shown great maturity and an extraordinary ability to control their feelings and continue the dialogue, handling political conflicts in an unprecedentedly civilized way. The Palestinian people and their leaders have not missed a chance to save the peace process and the PLO has valiantly honoured all its commitments.

The Israeli authorities, on the other hand, are temporizing and failing to meet their commitments to the Palestinian side.

The international community and the ILO in particular must therefore align themselves with what is right and just by taking the following action: Firstly, it must continue to hold a special session to monitor the situation in the occupied Arab territories. Secondly, it must set up a standing committee along the lines of the Committee on Apartheid in South Africa to protect the rights of the Palestinian workers and people, to strengthen trade unions and employers' organizations, to help the national Palestinian authorities to discharge their functions in this transitional period in the economic and social fields and to implement all its programmes on behalf of the Palestinian people. Thirdly, it must ask countries who have pledged to do so to provide the Palestinian authorities with material and technical assistance and vocational training so that people may return to a normal life. Fourthly, it must urge the Israeli side to engage in serious and speedy negotiations on all vital matters.

If all these points are included in an integrated peace plan the Arab-Israeli conflict will be ended in the near future and a new era based on coexistence and harmony will begin so that this region can finally live in the peace to which the Arab peoples have always aspired.

Mr. DATO' ANTHONY YEO (Government delegate, Malaysia) – This special sitting is indeed timely, coming in the wake of the historical Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements signed by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and Israel on 13 September 1993.

The Declaration for the time being covers only the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, which means that much of the Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories continue to remain under Israeli occupation. It is now well known that the timetable projected in the Declaration was not kept, and the pullout of Israeli occupation forces from the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area took place only in May 1994.

Malaysia has always maintained that the ongoing process aimed at a political settlement through peaceful means should and must lay the foundation for a comprehensive, just and durable solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The September peace accord and other talks must build mutual confidence that would ultimately facilitate the solution to the Palestinian issue within the framework of the relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions, in particular Resolutions 242 and 338. These resolutions, in fact, provide for the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to self-determination and to an independent homeland and the security of all States, including Israel.

It is pertinent to note that the agreements concluded today are provisional and interim in character, and the international community must do all it can to secure a comprehensive solution to the issue. The international community must continue to assume their responsibilities according to the relevant resolutions designed to vacate Israeli occupation of Palestine and other Arab territories.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for his Report on the situation of workers of the occupied territories, and express our deep appreciation to the representatives of the Director-General, who had held numerous meetings both in Israel and in the occupied Arab territories with government authorities, employers' and workers' representatives to discuss the conditions of workers in the occupied territories.

The Director-General's Report highlights the continued enforcement of repressive policies by the Israeli occupation authorities. The fact that these practices continue, even after the signing of agreements in Washington and in Cairo, shows Israel's utter disregard for the international community and international law.

According to the Director-General's Report, the economy of the occupied territories remains underdeveloped, dependant and subjected to massive constraints, vulnerable to external shocks and hardly managed. Preliminary data for 1993 suggest a sharp drop in national income and a severe deterioration of the trade deficit. It is therefore of most immediate importance that the international community address the drastic economic situation in the occupied territories.

The time has come for the international community to put in place, in conjunction with the Palestinian Economic Council for Development and Reconstruction (PECDAR), an action plan to provide emergency relief and undertake reconstruction in the Arab territories. We note that US$2 billion for emergency relief and reconstruction have been pledged, and PECDAR has been established to ensure the coordination and efficient use of external assistance in keeping with Palestinian priorities. But more needs to be done. We would like to call upon the donor countries to speed up the provision of financial support to the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) for projects geared to review the structure of the Palestinian society which was destroyed during the long period of Israeli occupation.

International organizations, including the ILO, must continue to fulfil their responsibilities to the implementation of a coordinated plan of action for relief aid and technical assistance.

My delegation would like to take this opportunity to express our appreciation for the plan presented by the ILO as part of its technical assistance programme for the Palestinian people. The importance of developing the plan further and implementing it according to the priority needs of the Palestinian people in the Gaza Strip and Jericho could hardly be overemphasized.

Such programmes must be tailored to cater to a larger segment of the Palestinian population as other occupied Palestinian territories are liberated as part of the next phase of the peace process. My delegation is of the view that there is a need to ensure the implementation of the Director-General's proposals and other constructive suggestions that may be put forward here. We wish to emphasize the importance of the special sitting of the Conference to examine the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories and the continued need to schedule such meetings in the future with a view to monitoring the situation there. This meeting might also consider the desirability of establishing a special committee to be seized with the practical aspects of implementing the Director-General's proposals.

Mr. ROSSI (Workers' adviser, Italy) – Permit me to express first of all my appreciation of the Director-General's Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

The Report provides us with a lot of valuable information and assessments which prove really useful as guidelines for the actions of those who are dealing with this terrible situation, and particularly for those who intend to make an effective contribution to building a just and lasting peace between the Palestinian and Israeli peoples and to ensuring stability and development in the entire Middle East region.

With the strong evidence of figures, the Report shows the effects of lack of employment, the absence of development opportunities and the systematic blockage of any economic and productive activity in the occupied Arab territories and in general among the Palestinian population. Furthermore, it concretely describes the very difficult conditions of the Palestinian workers, who have for a long time been deprived of their trade union protection and have been subjected to all sorts of violations of their rights by the police and by unscrupulous employers.

This assembly is being held in a new situation. The peace process is becoming more reliable and confident. Many dangerous delays have been overcome, and the courageous determination of the PLO and the Israeli leaders has prevailed over all the horrible crimes recently committed against innocent victims and peace by extremists of both the Palestinian and Israeli sides.

But each of us understands that peace, this difficult peace, cannot only be the result of the leaders' agreement or of political assessments and decisions. All of us know that peace can only be the product of a deep, wide-ranging and active consciousness of the women and men involved in a war that has lasted for too long.

This is particularly true, I believe, for the situation of these territories which, as the Report reminds us, have seen nothing but war, military occupation, violence, the violation of rights and injustice for the past 27 years.

Why does this situation have to be brought up again in this assembly today?

It has to be clearly affirmed, once more in this assembly, that without a visible, tangible change in the living conditions of women, men, young people and children in the occupied Arab territories, the building of peace will become an impossible challenge, subject to all sorts of attack from its many enemies. This will entail the risk of dangerous, heavy and lasting consequences in both the Palestinian and Israeli societies.

This is the reason why the main priority for everybody who wants peace today is economic and social development and the need to provide opportunities giving people faith in their future.

In this situation, the Palestinian trade unions have a great role to play.

Indeed, a preliminary condition and a true guarantee of success in reaching these objectives is the strong presence of autonomous, representative and democratic Palestinian trade unionism.

The Italian trade unions know the Palestinian trade unions and their important and representative leaders very well.

We believe we know their needs and the difficulties they face. We have tried, like many other unions in the world, to help them by supporting their efforts in organizing and strengthening themselves.

We also know their opinions about their current and future role in a democratic Palestinian society.

We fully agree with the assessments made by the ICFTU Coordinating Committee on the Middle East. We intend to continue playing an active role in the Committee.

Our aim as trade unionists is to support the important work of the Palestinian trade unions, helping them to organize the December 1994 elections and giving them assistance in the different fields of trade union activity, including trade union education, research and information activities.

Our aim is also to support the difficult but absolutely necessary dialogue between Palestinian and Israeli trade unions.

We consider that the Israeli trade union leaders understand the difficult situation very well, that they are able to provide appropriate responses to the demands of the Palestinian unions, and that they should do so.

But we think that our aim also is to help ensure a strong social dimension in the economic development of the whole region.

The current ILO activities, the ILO programme of action and its participation in the coordination of the activity of both international institutions and national governments are important to deal adequately with the challenges of peace and development.

In the same sense, the ICFTU, the ETUC and national trade unions must participate in discussions with the international institutions. As for us, we particularly must take part with our Government and the European Union, as well as with the Employers, in helping to implement development projects directed towards these objectives.

Mr. ZELLHOEFER (Workers' adviser, United States) – I would like to thank the President for giving me the opportunity to address this, now the fifth, and what I firmly hope, will be the last special sitting. The peace process has made very significant advances this past year that have been the result in an arena other than the ILO of a political dialogue and negotiation. Unfortunately, it is apparent that there are some who think the ILO is a political organization or an organization that can be used for political purposes.

The International Labour Organization is not a political organization. Its mandate is not political. It is a unique and specialized United Nations body with a globally accepted and respected competence. Its long established and well regarded technical expertise and supervisory machinery, as well as its overall authority, is dangerously undermined when attempts are made to politicize its work. Ignoring the time-tested normal supervisory machinery and accepted other procedures in order to hold special sittings like these, only serve to politicize the Organization and regrettably weaken its credibility. There are some who would prefer to see the ILO weakened or worse – and there are some who would prefer to see the peace process derailed or worse. I would hope the vast majority of the ILO's constituents fully understand and support that this Organization's competence and authority is anchored in its unique mandate, and that mandate is not political.

That having been said, and I have tried to be rather clear about the misuse of special sittings, there is obviously a proper and constructive role for the ILO to assist in the process of underpinning peace, security, democracy and social justice in this process, which is clearly within its mandate and competence. The Report of the Director-General (Part II: Appendix), which is being discussed today, notes a range of more recent ILO practical assistance, in particular the Governing Body's decision in March 1994 to propose to this Conference that $900,000 be allocated during the current biennium for a substantial programme of action in the territories which, importantly, is within the scope of the ILO's competence.

It is necessary to mention that there are a number of parts of the Director-General's Report that are either misleading or clearly slanted. There are numerous examples but, in the interest of time, I will mention just a few. There was no mention in this year's Report of the Histadrut having given 1 million shekel for a vocational training school in the Gaza Strip. More importantly, a number of references were made to the hardships on Palestinian workers who had been working in Israel that were caused by the closures of the West Bank and Gaza Strip during 1993 and this year. The reasons for these closures are well known. An impression was given in the Report that the Histadrut had not responded to the situation. Yet it had, through a communication to the Government suggesting the numbers of Palestinian workers being prevented from working in Israel was excessive and that 50 million shekel should be provided to create jobs for those workers excluded from working in Israel.

The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions' activities, in which we participate, to facilitate a multilateral international trade union programme of assistance to the Palestinian trade unions, was regrettably given too little attention in the Report. The ICFTU Coordinating Committee for the Middle East was established not only to assist the Palestinian trade unions, but, very importantly, at a broader regional level, an ICFTU project is providing a critically important programme of seminars to strengthen human and trade union rights which involves some ICFTU affiliates and some non-affiliated unions or workers' organizations from other countries in the region.

This leads me to the conclusion of these remarks and they concern the whole region. It should be rather painfully clear that underlying and in some very worrying ways, directly influencing the tensions and difficulties faced by Palestinian workers, their emerging trade unions and the daunting challenges to build a democratic and socially just society, is the deplorable state of human and trade union rights in the greater surrounding region.

Human dignity and thus human potential have been held in check by all too many regimes in the region through the suppression of fundamental human rights, including one of the most basic, freedom of association. The constructive, social justice, democracy-building role that genuine independent trade unions can play has been repeatedly blocked, all too often violently.

Workers in some 20 countries in the greater surrounding region continue to face serious violations of basic worker and trade union rights. Unions are simply banned outright in three countries. No collective bargaining is permitted in four countries. In one country, organizing a strike is punishable by death. Outright governmental control of labour organizations is the case in three countries. Only a few States permit trade unions to exist independent of government control, but these countries place very substantial restrictions on trade union activity. Slavery continues to exist in two countries.

The lack of democracy and the failure to develop supportive civil democratic institutions when linked to immense social inequities and appalling poverty clearly continue to be fertile ground for the seeds of fanatic, violent extremism. Meeting this challenge head on is the real issue before all of us.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – It is my privilege and honour to convey appreciation for the decision of the Governing Body of ILO to place the Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories on the agenda of this special sitting.

We also appreciate and welcome the Director-General's Report and support the speakers before me who have urged that the Palestinian and other Israeli conflicts be settled peacefully to the greater interest of peace in the region and the world as a whole.

We also take note of the positive developments during this period and that an agreement has been signed between the parties, through the good office of the Government of the United States; however, we believe it is not an end in itself but rather a beginning to a permanent solution in respect of the right of self-determination for the Arab people of the occupied territories.

We also believe that the settlements in the occupied Arab territories require dismantling as has been pointed out in paragraph 100 of the Director-General's Report, which states: "the international community has repeatedly requested that a halt be brought to these settlements, which are devoid of any legal basis and seriously obstruct the establishment of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace".

We note that the Director-General sent a special high-level mission of 15 senior experts, which made very concrete recommendations on providing technical assistance in the area of employment, lodging, training facilities, promoting industrial relations between the parties and social security benefits to the workers in the occupied Arab territories.

We believe in this peace process. Therefore, the ILO and other international agencies have a highly important role to play in order to solve the economic and social problems confronting the workers in this region. We thus welcome the allocation of resources to technical assistance in this area by the ILO, as well as identifying 30 projects by this high-level mission as pointed out in paragraphs 114 to 121 of the Report. We trust that the Director-General and the Governing Body will allocate adequate resources to carry out these projects, and particularly to boost the capacity of the trade unions so that they may actively participate in promoting the social well-being of the workers in this area. We also look forward to a better future for the workers in the occupied Arab territories, so that they can live in freedom, with dignity and economic security and in accordance with the aspirations of the people of these territories and in the interests of peace for the region and the world.

Mr. OTERO (Government delegate, United States) – My delegation is pleased that the speakers this afternoon, with only a few exceptions, have been positive in their statements and have focused on the positive developments, on the ILO plans, and on the future of this region. This marks a dramatic improvement in the substance and tone for this sitting. My delegation applauds this development.

There are many reasons for us to be positive today. The most important of these are the dramatic strides which have been made in the peace process. The Israeli/PLO Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Managements, signed in Washington on 13 September 1993, represented the first conceptual breakthrough in the Madrid peace process. It has now been followed by the 4 May Cairo Agreement on implementation of the first stage of the Declaration of Principles relating to Gaza and Jericho, which includes as an annex the Economic Protocol completed in late April. Negotiations will continue in the future on the extension of Palestinian interim self-government to other parts of the West Bank. The Declaration of Principles also stipulates that the next phase of implementation of the interim self-government includes elections for a Palestinian Council.

The United States believes that both Israel and the PLO are committed to the successful implementation of the Declaration of Principles. The United States will continue to actively assist this process by contributing bilateral aid to the Palestinians and participating in the coordination of international assistance. The initial progress achieved demonstrates the real benefits of peace negotiations. The United States calls on all Members of the International Labour Organization to give their full support to these agreements and to the ongoing peace process.

Following the signature of the Declaration of Principles, the ILO acted quickly in producing a comprehensive set of proposals to assist, in the ILO's areas of expertise and competence, the Palestinian Authority in such vital areas as establishing a system of labour administration, promoting the creation of jobs and developing human resources. The ILO is to be commended for its initiative and well-designed proposals – particularly those on public works in Gaza and vocational training for ex-detainees, both of which are ready for early implementation once the money becomes available.

The United States Government is actively involved in coordinating programmes which will contribute to economic development and political stability in Gaza and the West Bank. It is vital that these programmes be implemented as rapidly as possible in order to demonstrate to the Palestinians the concrete benefits of peace.

The United States stands willing to do its full part in this effort. On 1 October 1993, at the Conference to support the Middle East peace in Washington, DC, Vice-President Gore announced that the United States Government will provide US$500 million in assistance over a five-year period, commencing in 1994, with US$375 million of this to be provided by the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), and US$125 million through the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC).

To date, USAID has contracted, granted, or committed more than US$57 million for the implementation of projects in such areas as improving the availability of clean water, health care and adequate housing, as well as strengthening small businesses, municipalities, democracy and legal institutions, contributing funds towards the start-up costs of the Palestinian Authority. This also includes a US$5 million grant to the Palestinian police, US$10 million to the World Bank's Holst Fund for costs to start a project and another US$5 million to the Bank for technical assistance. By the end of September of this year, USAID will obligate the remaining US$18 million of our 1994 fiscal year commitment of US$75 million for 1994.

The Overseas Private Investment Corporation has the green light to start the process at their end. They have done some preliminary planning by contacting potential investors. However, OPIC cannot proceed until the agreement between the United States Department of State, the Palestinians and Israel has been negotiated. These negotiations are now moving forward.

Even though the agreement has yet to be signed, OPIC has begun planning for a reverse mission, scheduled for early October 1994. This mission will bring 15 to 20 Palestinian business persons to the United States to meet with interested United States investors. The purpose of the mission is, essentially, twofold: to promote United States/Palestinian joint ventures and investments in the Gaza/West Bank area; and to stimulate positive economic growth and development in the Gaza/West Bank areas. An additional benefit will be the enhancement of overall business ties between the Palestinian business community and United States business firms, as well as opportunities for United States business.

Despite the fact that this special sitting is an improvement of those of the past, the United States Government continues to oppose the practice of holding such sittings. This practice results in singling out one ILO member State, in this case Israel, for treatment which is different from that of other Members. In addition to this general point, the United States believes that the new situation in the occupied territories deserves to be reflected in the actions of the international community, including the ILO. It is time for this practice to end. My delegation believes that today's sitting should be the last special sitting held on the occupied territories and we will work towards this end in the coming months. We call on all supporters of the peace process, especially the PLO and Arab Members of the ILO, to join the United States in this effort.

Mr. GOLMOHAMMADI (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – Let me begin by thanking the ILO for convening this meeting at the time of the continuing and worsening situation of millions of Palestinians in the occupied territories. Although, according to past experience, there is no hope that this sitting will generate effective relief for them.

My delegation has listened to the opening statement and also to the statements of previous speakers regarding the painful conditions of the workers of the occupied Arab territories. In fact, the International Labour Organization has dealt with this question since its inception. Yet, all the while, the plight of Palestinian and other workers in the occupied territories has become increasingly severe and complex. The occupying regime has chosen to ignore the national and inalienable rights of the workers to enjoy a dignified, secure and sovereign life and work in their homeland.

It is an established fact that the occupying regime has been oppressing and violating the elementary rights of the workers in the occupied territories during decades of occupation. The report now confirms that Israel's restrictive policy measures have continued and have brought about a growing crisis in workers' activities and their economic and living conditions in the occupied territories. In addition, the content of the present report is a clear indication that, despite all intensive efforts so far made by the United Nations and the United Nations agencies, including the ILO, the situation of the workers and others has not been improved, but the inhuman practices of occupying forces have intensified in number and in severity.

We believe, therefore, that any solutions to the Palestinian problem lie in decisive action aimed at removing the causes. In this context, it is clear that any approach to the Palestine and the Middle East situation should be based on justice and be comprehensive in nature. Without it, there will come no peace to the Middle East and the Palestine cause will remain.

On the broader spectrum, the only solution for Palestine and the occupied territories is to strive for the full realization of Palestinian human and national rights. The current peace agreement all but reduces these rights. Peace cannot be built in Palestine on the basis of submission. It can only come about on solid foundations of justice. Until then, the Palestinians shall continue to suffer – the entire nation, including its workers – and until then the entire Islamic Ummah will continue to bleed.

Original French: Mrs. MEUNIER (Workers' adviser, Belgium) – During this special session we wished to take the floor in order to express our solidarity with the workers in the occupied Arab territories and to give our support to the ILO action in this strife-torn region.

The struggle for self-determination of the Palestinian people was and remains a just struggle against the arbitrary illegal occupation of its country.

In particular, we wish to reaffirm our support to the Palestinian workers and the organizations which represent the foundations of the civilian Palestinian society.

While if we welcome the peace process and the agreements on Gaza and Jericho, we nevertheless consider that today this is but a timid and largely inadequate first step on this road to peace.

It is indeed essential that the Western countries respect their commitments to provide financial and logistical support, in order to create the greatest possible chances for the success of this process.

The recognition of the PLO by the State of Israel was a courageous and historic act. Unfortunately, so far the great historic rendezvous between the Jewish and Palestinian peoples is still in the future. Until such time as the resolutions of the United Nations have been recognized and implemented by all as a political basis for the future development of relations in that region, there is still a risk of deterioration of the situation.

Moreover, we regret the fact that, as regards the rights of Palestinian workers, no progress has been noted by the mission of the Director-General.

The problems of the Palestinian workers do not depend solely on political solutions to problems in the region, although they are conditioned to a certain extent by those political solutions. For our part, we feel that it is essential, during this period of the establishment of autonomous Palestinian structures, that the social actors – and primarily the workers' and employers' organizations – be allowed to organize themselves freely and establish a system of labour relations.

To this end, we very much hope that the ILO will continue its efforts to assist the Palestinian employers and workers to construct a solid basis for the Palestine of tomorrow.

Original Arabic: Mr. DJEMAM (representative of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The Report of the Director-General gives a very vivid picture of the violation of human rights in Palestine and in the other occupied Arab territories and it shows clearly how this prevents the implementation of the ILO's standards. It also prevents Arab workers in a weak position from exercising their rights and facilitates discrimination and arbitrary treatment.

The Report confirms that no change whatsoever has occurred in the situation described by the mission in previous years, either in the administrative or in the security and military structures set up since 1967. The same is true of the situation of Palestinian workers earning their living in Israel.

The Report also notes the admission by Histadrut that the occupation has not allowed the development of a trade union movement in Palestine, nor has it allowed Palestinian trade unionists to attend to the social and economic interests of workers. The Director-General's Report also confirms that living standards are beneath the acceptable minimum and unstable. Work contracts are signed on a one-day basis, a practice incompatible with human dignity. Such behaviour has now become habitual. These are some of the facts contained in the Director-General's Report, on which he deserves our congratulations.

The practices described include discrimination, disrespect for human life, murder of the people of the Holy Land, violations of dignity and human rights – all of this has become the order of the day for the Palestinian workers and population of the occupied territories.

International support for human rights and for pressure and sanctions in the case of South Africa played an important role in producing the present happy results in that country. Tripartite dialogue also contributed positively towards that end, a source of satisfaction for the ILO. Moreover, our Organization is the first to recognize the rights of Palestinian workers. It is our intention to press ahead with this policy, building awareness internationally, exposing inhuman Israeli practices and probably changing misperceptions that have been prevalent, as well as providing support for the process that aims at restoring Palestinian rights. We depend on the influence that this Organization has demonstrated in the case of South Africa and we therefore reaffirm our demand for the continued convening of this sitting to build awareness and for the dispatch of missions to monitor the situation of workers in the occupied Palestinian and Arab territories for as long as the occupation and oppressive practices continue.

Although the technical cooperation programmes provided to the Palestinian people in the occupied territories are far from adequate, they are a good thing inasmuch as they reaffirm their right to return to their home, to self-determination and to establish their own State, with its capital in Jerusalem.

We feel that peace in the Middle East will not come about until all parties implement the resolutions of the Security Council. The peace process cannot succeed while the attacks on south Lebanon continue and without the complete withdrawal of Israel from south Lebanon, the Golan Heights and all Palestinian and other occupied Arab territories.

Many people welcomed the Gaza-Jericho agreement, but we believe it is not in conformity with the Security Council resolutions or with the aspirations of the Palestinian people to self-determination. We can only hope that it is a first small step towards achieving the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

(Mr Gray takes the Chair.)

Mr. SUNMONU (representative of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – As this is the first time I have taken the floor, I would like to congratulate the President and all the Officers of the Conference on their well-deserved election.

Please permit me, on behalf of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the entire workforce of Africa, to congratulate the Director-General for his excellent and lucid Report on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories.

For the first time in the history of the Director-General's Report, there is cause for optimism and hope, as a result of the agreement signed in Washington on 13 September 1993 between the Israeli Government and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) on a Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements.

We heartily congratulate the Israeli Government and the PLO for the Cairo agreement which we, and the rest of the international community, consider as the first step in the journey to the total liberation of all other occupied Arab territories and the independence and statehood of Palestine with Jerusalem as its capital. We therefore appeal to all the parties to the Middle East conflict to continue to work tirelessly for a durable and just peace in the region.

The enemies of peace among Israelis and Palestinians should be isolated and disarmed so as not to constitute a cog in the wheel of peace and progress.

As stated in paragraph 18 of the Report, we are not happy with the delay in the timetable for the implementation of the Declaration of Principles by Israel since it was signed, as it will be used by the enemies of peace among Israelis and Palestinians to derail the whole peace process.

As the occupier, one expects the Government of Israel, not only to abide by the agreement it concluded with the PLO, but also to take confidence-building steps by improving human and trade union rights and the genuine economic development of the Palestinians in order to ensure what the Director-General rightly said in paragraph 19 of the Report, and I quote: "peaceful coexistence of the peoples of the region".

The sad picture painted by the Report on the economy and labour market of the occupied Palestinian territories is a matter of concern. The arbitrary and punitive use of prolonged curfews and border closures resulting in a sharp drop in national income and the deterioration of the living conditions of the Palestinians is, in our view, a violation of the fundamental rights of the Palestinian workers and peoples and very unhelpful to the peace process.

On this occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, we call on the Israeli Government, as a member State of the ILO, to fully apply the principles of the ILO in its dealings with the Palestinian workers and peoples. Both Israelis and Palestinians will in the end be the main beneficiaries of the peace dividend in that region.

Employment is one of the most critical areas of need for the Palestinians in addition to housing, water, electricity, roads, health and education infrastructure, which has been neglected by the Israeli occupying force for decades.

The assistance promised by the donors to the new Palestinian administration should be promptly realized in order to facilitate the provision of the abovenamed infrastructures, which will in turn assist in the creation of jobs for the Palestinians and improve their living conditions.

In our opinion, the ILO should influence the United Nations agencies and the international community to use the "basic needs strategy" as the development strategy for the Palestinian administration in Gaza and Jericho. The ILO can also assist the Palestinians – as it has always done – in the areas of workers' education, labour legislation, vocational training and public works programmes, which the Palestinian workers are in great need of.

It is sad to note in the Report, that the problem of social insurance contributions by Palestinian workers has not been solved by the Israeli authorities in spite of the evident gross violation of the rights of Palestinian workers and ILO standards by Israel on the matter.

The refusal by Israel to include the social insurance contributions in its negotiations with the PLO is in our opinion also very unfair. In order to ensure a lasting peace, justice should be observed in all the negotiations between the two parties.

We are also happy to note the move towards unity by the Palestinian trade unions, and I would also appeal to them – to the leaders of the Palestinian trade unions and members – to bury their differences and unite. It is only through their unity that they can be strong enough to defend the interests of their members and their organizations. Our appreciation goes to the Norwegian, Japanese, United States and other European trade unions that have assisted the Palestinian trade unions. We also commend the initiative taken by the PLO and also by the ICFTU to bring Palestinian and Israeli trade unions together to discuss their problems.

The International Trade Union Committee for the support of Palestinian workers set up by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU) is also commended for its support of the Palestinian workers and trade unions.

The leadership of Histadrut should correct the anomaly and injustice inherent in the one per cent of Palestinian workers' wages paid to Histadrut, and which in turn denies them membership of Histadrut and also prevents them from being represented by unions of their choice.

Leaders of the Israeli Association for the defence of Palestinian Workers, Hav La'oved, deserve our hearty congratulations and appreciation for their valiant defence of, and assistance to, Palestinian workers.

As reported in paragraphs 90-99 of the Report, it is sad to note that Israel continues to violate the rights of the Golan workers and peoples in violation of international law and the fundamental rights of the Golan people. Israel should change it recalcitrant attitude to facilitate the peace process. It should stop its illegal confiscation of the land of the Golan people and the building of Jewish settlements.

We would like to commend the ILO for the multifarious assistance it has been giving to the Palestinians. In particular, the recent multidisciplinary team sent by the Director-General at the request of the PLO Chairman, is warmly welcomed by us. We call on the ILO to mobilize donor assistance for the successful implementation of the thirty project ideas elaborated by the ILO mission report. The Director-General should please ensure that the employment generation, provision of basic needs and human resources development and utilization form the bedrock of ILO projects for the Palestinians.

Finally, in order to ensure and guarantee the rights of the Palestinian workers and people, especially from recent experience in the occupied Palestinian territories, the OATUU calls for the establishment of a committee on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories by the ILO Governing Body.

Original Spanish: Mr. CUSTER (representative, World Confederation of Labour) – The World Confederation of Labour has for many years now been constantly denouncing the serious violation of human and trade union rights of the workers of Palestine, victims of Israeli military occupation. We have been active defenders of the struggle for liberation of this extraordinary people, and we re-emphasize our solidarity, particularly with the Palestine Trade Union Federation with whom we have close ties of friendship and cooperation.

We would also like to reaffirm, what we have been stating for many years, that there will be no real peace in the Middle East whilst the Government of Israel continues to disregard the resolutions of the United Nations, and continues to maintain military occupation and whilst there is a continuing irresponsible and most serious Jewish colonization of Arab land, and whilst thousands of Palestinians continue to be imprisoned in Israeli prisons, and ultimately so long as there is no clear recognition in a firm and definite form of the absolute right to self-determination of the people of Palestine in recognition of their legitimate wish to create a sovereign national State.

We would like to call attention to the sentiment of many of our Arab friends – and which we share – that, whilst the United Nations harshly condemn certain countries, other States totally disregard the resolutions of the Security Council, and do so with impunity. This feeling of "two weights and two measures" particularly affects the Arab peoples, Palestinians in particular, and represents a threat to the credibility and objectivity of the United Nations system itself.

We have sometimes heard it said that the problem of the occupied Arab territories and the need to find an urgent solution to the problem are political problems and ultimately therefore alien to the ILO. Happily there is scarcely any support for this idea, since the Constitution of our Organization and the Declaration of Philadelphia clearly establish that respect of human rights is an essential element in trade union activities.

We welcome the signing of the Gaza-Jericho agreement, although we know that this does not correspond to the aspirations of the Palestinian workers. But the agreement will be positive if there is the beginning of an urgently needed process which will lead to full self-determination for Palestine and withdrawal from the occupied Arab territories including Lebanon and Golan.

In the tragic process in the Middle East, we saw an historical moment when the PLO recognized the State of Israel. An egoistic and suicidal vision prevented real peace in that region, and now there are no further excuses for not implementing the resolution of the United Nations, withdrawing from the occupied territories and making Palestinian self-determination truly a reality.

We appreciate the Report of the Director-General and would like to call attention to his reference to the continuing settlement of Jewish colonies and the text which states that despite their action and the negotiations under way, the arbitrary practices and security restrictions affecting workers have not been eased. Both these statements draw attention to very serious aspects of this situation.

We believe that the ILO must continue to play a primary role on behalf of the Arab workers in the occupied territories, intensifying its technical assistance cooperation, and creating a standing committee which will make it possible to coordinate and actively follow up this situation. This is one of the major problems affecting the international community, and its serious consequences require the ILO to consider it as a priority.

We would take this opportunity to express our hope that there will be a just peace in the Middle East, that there will be full reconciliation of the neighbouring peoples and that there will be full and absolute respect of the self-determination and sovereignty of all nations.

Original French: Mr. FRISO (representative, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – This year the special sitting on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories is being held in much happier circumstances than in the past.

It is being held following the partial agreements which have been made between the PLO and the State of Israel following the Declaration of Principles which was signed in Washington by Mr. Arafat and Mr. Rabin, and which finally opened up the way for the search for a solution to the Palestinian problem through peaceful means.

All men of goodwill, and in particular governments and inter-governmental institutions, have a moral duty to support these efforts. This is most probably going to be a long and difficult process, studded with difficulties, and we must hope that all the countries that are directly or indirectly concerned will act in such a way as to make it possible to eliminate the obstacles and to facilitate the task of the negotiators.

The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, which I have the honour of representing, intends to work as closely as possible with the Palestinian trade union organizations to facilitate their tasks in the territories which will come under the responsibility of the Palestinian authorities.

I would like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General, for having organized in December 1993 the multidisciplinary mission which has given us a very important report with an analysis of the situation within the areas of competence of the ILO. Among other things, it has pointed to the need to promote strategies for the development of the social and labour sectors, the aim of which should be to create jobs, to reduce poverty and to reinforce social protection.

The economically developed countries, including the rich Gulf countries, should considerably increase their voluntary contributions to the ILO so as to make it possible for the ILO to carry out the programme suggested by the mission. My organization, through its affiliates, will exert pressure on the governments of various countries to consider the financing of the programme suggested by the mission as a priority.

It is also necessary to find a solution as rapidly as possible to the disputes between the Palestinian unions and the Israeli authorities regarding the Palestinian workers who were prevented from going to their jobs in Israel, and who were plunged into an absolutely intolerable situation, both they and their families, which has now been going on for several months. Here again, we intend to play a constructive role, of course together with the Palestinian unions and with the collaboration of our affiliates in Israel, the Histadrut. If one wishes to resolve in a manner satisfactory to the parties concerned all the problems in the Middle East, and the problem of the Palestinian people in particular, it is imperative to play the card of negotiation decisively. We, the ICFTU, with the means available to us, want to ensure that chance smiles on us and on those of both sides who had the political courage to choose the path of dialogue. This is why it is our duty to ask ourselves whether special sittings such as this one are of a nature to facilitate their already difficult task. We have serious doubts on this point.

Original French: Mr. VITTORI (representative, Pax Christi International) – On 13 September 1993, Israel finally recognized the existence of the Palestinian people, agreeing to negotiate directly with their representatives. This political turning point, while of capital importance, nevertheless will only open up the road to peace to the extent that it allows for real improvements in the living and working conditions of Palestinians.

Unfortunately, this is not the conclusion to be drawn on reading the Report of the Director-General. On the contrary, in many areas, we see the reverse is the case. The limited autonomy that has been granted seems to resemble a penitentiary, which the administration has decided to leave, simply opening the doors of the cells and leaving the prisoners to organize themselves in "freedom" within the prison compound, where the exits and entrances are policed and militarily controlled.

Earlier speakers have already referred to the United Nations resolutions which have proved impossible to enforce, and therefore I shall not dwell on this or on the Geneva Conventions so arrogantly ignored. Nor shall I mention ILO standards which are apparently impossible to apply. The Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations this year, as in past years, does not indicate the slightest violation of ILO Conventions in the occupied territories. What we have to bear in mind constantly is the fact that Palestinians are, in fact, indirect victims of Western anti-semitism, without which the State of Israel would probably not exist today.

From the Spanish Inquisition to the Shoah, throughout a long series of pogroms, the Jewish people in Europe have been subject to terrible persecutions. Have not the Palestinians, who were not responsible for these persecutions, been perhaps unjustly sacrificed on the altar of the guilty conscience of the West?

It is time to recognize this now that circumstances make reparation possible without prejudice to the victims of anti-semitism. Investments of 2,500 million dollars have been promised but, of course, these are conditional on the establishment of a Palestinian administration. How can this be done without the material means indispensable to its organization? It is not Israel which is going to provide these sums by estitution of taxes levied in Gaza and Jericho. The ch countries of the Gulf are not showing any altru- m, and the Western countries are not exactly rush- g to help. And yet, it is peace that is at stake. Are e once again going to miss the opportunity now hen those responsible on both sides have taken tre- endous personal risks, vis-à-vis their people?

The agreement signed on 4 May this year in Cairo pens up a historic and providential opportunity to art remedying the injustices perpetrated on the Pal- stinian people, whilst at the same time bringing eace to Israel. The urgent matter is to give to the alestinian administration – without any other de- and being made than the guarantee of appropriate nd correct management as regards human rights – e financial and technical means of establishing a tate which can truly become operational. Madame anan Ashrawi, who is responsible in the independ- nt Palestinian organization for the monitoring of uman rights, recently compared the autonomous dministration of Gaza and Jericho with someone ound hand and foot, thrown into a swimming-pool nd expected to prove that he can swim.

It is with satisfaction that we welcome the recent ecision by a group of donor countries to release 42 illion dollars to help in the creation of the adminis- ative infrastructures necessary for receiving further vestment in the short and long term. But that is far om sufficient. Just by comparison, it corresponds to e month's budget for the city of Geneva. We have so learnt that the women of the territories will now e able to go freely to Eastern Jerusalem, and that e Israeli authorities have somewhat relaxed the les as regards workers seeking employment in Is- el. Despite these positive signs, peace still remains agile. It could become much stronger if there were absorption of settlers from the colonies, which rep- esent risk zones obliging the Israeli army to main- in a presence there whose sole justification is the rotection of those settlers.

After any war, and this one could flare up at any me again, it is necessary to have minesweepers to ear the ground in order to avoid risks of death hich remain and will continue for many years to me. This should not cause any problem as regards e land of Israel, but as regards peoples' minds it is nother matter. Decades of oppression, blind vio- nce, psychological manipulation, lies, all aimed at ilifying the adversary, have in fact led consciences stray. Pax Christi shares with the majority of be- evers the deep-felt conviction that true peace, a gift om the Almighty, is not possible unless it is re- eived in the depths of each heart.

Brothers through a will that transcends them, the eople of the Holy Land are co-heirs to the prom- e made to their common father in faith. May they ecognize each other and stand in solidarity before e sign of his tomb, which has been tragically pro- aned.

Original Russian: Mr. POTAPOV (representative, orld Federation of Trade Unions) – On behalf of e World Federation of Trade Unions I would like extend my greetings to the participants in this fo- um, which is taking place within the framework of e 81st Session of the General Conference of the LO, and I would like to express our full brotherly olidarity with the Palestinian people, who have been ghting for many years for the restoration of their legitimate rights and liberties in the Arab territory of Palestine.

The World Federation of Trade Unions would like to express its deep concern at the suffering of the Palestinian people, which over decades has been deprived of its native lands and whose civil rights are constantly being flouted by Israel in the occupied territories.

Consequently, there is every justification for the struggle of the Palestinian workers, and the entire Palestinian people, for their inalienable national rights and, above all, for the right of self-determination and the creation of an independent State.

It is our opinion that a solution of the Middle Eastern problem, including the Palestinian question, can only be found on the basis of a full withdrawal of Israeli forces from all the occupied Arab territories (the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, East Jerusalem, the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon) and on the basis of the guaranteed right of the Palestinian people to return to their land and to take democratic decisions regarding their future.

Despite the signing of a number of agreements in recent times, the situation in the occupied Arab territories still remains extremely tense. The Report put before us by the Director-General of the ILO reflects – although far from fully – the poor – and sometimes even catastrophic conditions under which more than one-and-a-half million Palestinians in the occupied territories are forced to live.

It is with great regret that we note that as regards the local Palestinian population, the Israeli authorities continue to apply a policy of "creeping annexation", under which the most fertile lands are confiscated, artificial restrictions are imposed on the marketing of produce, Arab villages are destroyed, and in their stead settlements for Israeli settlers are built illegally. All these measures condemn the local population to deprivation and poverty and turn them into a supply of cheap labour, deprived of any legal protection, for the Israeli economy.

We are particularly concerned – and this is also referred to in the Report of the Director-General – at the practices of the authorities with regard to the trade union organizations of Palestinian workers: under all kinds of pretexts such as closing of borders, road blocks, curfews, etc., obstacles are placed in the way of the normal activity of the trade unions.

The information coming from the occupied territories provides convincing evidence of the unbearable situation in the region. While appreciating the efforts of the authors of the Report, we feel that their work should be continued as long as this proves to be necessary. The ILO can and must make its valuable contribution to the elimination of the situation which has developed in the occupied Arab territories, and to ensuring that the Palestinian people have the appropriate conditions for a life of freedom and dignity.

The World Federation of Trade Unions reiterates its continued solidarity with and support of the just struggle of the Palestinian people for their liberation and the defence of the inalienable right to self-determination and independent development.

Original Russian: Mr. KANAYEV (representative, General Confederation of Trade Unions) – Allow me to join the other speakers in congratulating the President on his unanimous election to this responsible and honourable post and to wish him full success in leading this anniversary session of our Conference.

This year we are discussing the difficult and painful question of the situation of workers in the Arab territories occupied by Israel against the backdrop of a real possibility that this complex problem might be resolved peacefully and in the interests of both parties.

The recognition by Israel of the PLO as the genuine representative of the Palestinian people, the signing of the Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements for the Gaza Strip and the Jericho region and the beginning of talks on the Golan Heights between Israel and Syria give reason to hope that a comprehensive peaceful settlement will be reached in the Middle East.

However, this is just the beginning. One swallow does not a summer make. The Report of the Director-General convincingly points to the fact that the situation in this region has, practically speaking, remained unchanged. The administrative, police and military structures remain unchanged in the occupied territories. All sorts of pretexts are being used to delay the transfer to the Palestinian authorities of the territories concerned. The creation of Israeli settlements on Palestinian land is continuing. This leads to confrontation and even to armed clashes. Palestinian workers are subjected to harsh discrimination in recruitment and conditions of work. Their freedom of movement is limited.

There is reason for concern because the representatives of the Director-General received no assurances from the Israeli authorities that the conditions of recruitment and work would change in favour of social justice even after the implementation of the agreement on self-rule.

At the current session of the Conference, which is taking place with the strengthening of social justice as its theme, the International Labour Organization should vociferously, firmly and decisively advocate a rapid and peaceful solution and the establishment of good neighbourly relations between all peoples in this explosive region.

We welcome the attempts at a dialogue between the Histadrut and the trade unions of Palestine, and hope that these talks will lead to an improvement in the situation of the Palestinian workers. We also greatly appreciate the work of the ILO in assisting Palestinian trade unions and workers. However, we believe the time has come to redouble our efforts in order to create the best possible conditions for a normal life and for normal work for this long-suffering people. We have the fantastic example of the victory of reason and progress in South Africa. But it took many years of struggle and efforts by all mankind and by all freedom-loving forces to achieve that victory. I believe the same solidarity and unity of purpose will be necessary to settle the problem of Palestine. I think in this connection that it is reasonable to refer to the point made by many speakers to the effect that within the ILO we should establish a system similar to the one which was created originally for South Africa and which continues to exist today to encourage positive change.

The PRESIDENT – According to the arrangements established by the Conference for this sitting, it is not my task to draw any lesson or conclusion from the lengthy, substantial and at times difficult debate which has just taken place. May I be allowed, however, to express my deep satisfaction and appreciation at the fact that this sitting has taken place in conditions which are consonant with the dignity required by the topic and subject we have dealt with.

I wish to commend the real effort that was made to circumscribe the debate within the field of competence of our Organization, that is the situation of workers and employers of the occupied Arab territories, even if it is not always easy to dissociate it from the general context in which it takes place. If our Organization wants to be true to its mandate of promoting and defending respect for human and workers' and employers' rights, it cannot ignore the difficult situation of these workers and of their families. The usefulness of the Report of the Director-General is clearly recognizable by the fact that it forms the basis for this debate, which I sincerely hope will contribute to the promotion of a real dialogue and strengthen the determination to find an equitable and lasting solution to the difficult situation of these workers and employers.

I am sure the Director-General will draw important and useful conclusions from this sitting in giving his reply to the general discussion of his Report, at the end of this session of the Conference. I would like to thank him for this at the outset, and I also thank all of you for your spirit of cooperation, without which we would not have been able to carry out this special sitting.

(The Conference adjourned at 7.15 p.m.)

Seventeenth (special) sitting:

Report of the Director-General on the situation of workers of the occupied Arab territories: Discussion 1

Report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid

1. The Committee was established following a decision of the Governing Body, taken at its 258th Session (November 1993), to place an item on the agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference for the review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which was adopted by the Conference in 1964 and subsequently updated several times.

2. The Committee was composed of 51 members with the right to vote (20 Government members, 11 Employers' members, and 20 Workers' members). It also included 2 deputy Government members, 10 Employers' deputy members, and 17 Workers' deputy members. In accordance with the usual procedure, equal voting for the three groups was assured by the appropriate system of weighted voting. A number of organizations with consultative status were represented by observers.

3. At its opening sitting, the Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mr. P. K. Balopi (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. B. G. Hernandez (Employers' member, Philippines) and Mr. W. Brett (Workers' member, United Kingdom).

Reporter: Mr. B. Jonzon (Government member, Sweden).

4. The Committee held three sittings. Its agenda was to review the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa. In this task it used the following documentation: the Special Report of the Director-General on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa (which contained an historic overview of ILO action against apartheid, provided information on other international action against apartheid, and listed replies by ILO constituents to the questionnaire sent to them in accordance with the Declaration); and a document supplementing the Special Report (which provided a brief summary of the principal events in the labour and social fields which have occurred in South Africa since the preparation of that Special Report). The Committee also had before it a number of documents of the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and Labour Standards, in particular its reports adopted at the 258th and 259th Sessions of the Governing Body (November 1993 and March 1994 respectively).

5. The representative of the Secretary-General (Mr. F. Abdel-Rahman, Assistant Director-General) welcomed both the readmission of South Africa to the ILO and the participation of the country's full, tripartite and multiracial delegation in the Conference. The Committee was charged with reviewing the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, first adopted in 1964 and updated in 1981, 1988 and 1991. In accordance with paragraph 21 of the conclusions contained in the Committee's report adopted at the 80th Session (June 1993) of the International Labour Conference, the Governing Body, at its 258th Session (November 1993), considered the progress made towards the elimination of apartheid and decided to suspend the application of the Declaration. It decided that the question of reviewing the Declaration should be placed on the agenda of the 81st Session (June 1994) of the International Labour Conference, for consideration by the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid. On that occasion, the Governing Body also approved a plan of action for ILO assistance to South Africa in the transition to full democracy and in overcoming the effects of apartheid. At its 259th Session (March 1994), the Governing Body noted further progress and decided that the ILO should make an immediate contribution to finance voters' education prior to the first general non-racial election in April 1994. The immediate task of the Committee was to come to a decision concerning the Declaration, perhaps by recommending its rescission either in a final recommendation of the Committee's report or in a separate resolution annexed to that report. A decision might also be taken to dissolve the Committee. Relevant information was contained in the Special Report of the Director-General on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and in the supplement to that Special Report. The Special Report described the history of the action of the Conference, which had examined 29 such reports. It also outlined the technical cooperation activities — financed from the ILO's regular budget and by generous multi-bilateral aid, especially from the Nordic countries — which had been oriented towards assisting the social partners, building capacity to govern in the future and promoting the principles of democracy and multiracialism. In addition, the Governing Body had convened special meetings, such as the International Meeting on Action against Apartheid (Livingston, May 1981), the Tripartite Conference on Apartheid (Lusaka, May 1984) and the two Harare Tripartite Conferences (May 1988 and May 1992). Sustained growth and genuine development in the country required a profound restructuring of the economic and social sectors. In this process, it was necessary to consult those organizations which had initiated grass-root action in favour of disadvantaged communities in the areas of education, training, health and housing. More generally, there was a need for a comprehensive programme, incorporating affirmative action measures, to tackle the glaring socio-economic imbalances created by apartheid. It was particularly necessary to promote the empowerment of the black population through human resources development which encouraged entrepreneurship and skills in management and administration. The ILO had to be ready to respond to these needs. If the Committee decided to rescind the Declaration, the door would be opened for the implementation of the plan of action for ILO technical cooperation, encompassing a wide range of labour and social issues, in particular in the areas of human rights, employment creation, enterprise promotion, labour law and administration, working and living conditions, human resources development and occupational safety and health.

6. The Chairperson (the Honourable P.K. Balopi, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of Botswana) expressed gratitude for the confidence and trust bestowed on his country, which had played a significant role in the liberation of South Africa by promoting a spirit of reconciliation and mutual understanding. It was fitting that a review of the aims and objectives of the Committee, and a consideration of its future, be undertaken in the presence of an official tripartite delegation from South Africa. In its work, the Committee should take account of the fact that South Africa would require, for some time, the support of the ILO in the social and labour fields, in order to redress the effects and vestiges of apartheid. It was imperative for the ILO to play a major role in assisting the programme of reconstruction and development announced by the Government of South Africa. The ILO had already sent several missions to South Africa to determine the ways in which it might cooperate with the social partners in transforming the society, alleviating poverty, improving the quality of life and strengthening the new democracy. He recalled that in September 1994, the ILO was due to take part in an international donors' conference in Johannesburg on human resources development for a post-apartheid South Africa, organized by the United Nations Development Programme and the Commonwealth.

7. In opening the general discussion, the Chairperson recalled that the task before the Committee was to review the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa.

8. The Employers' members expressed their great satisfaction with the installation of a sovereign government of national unity, following free and democratic elections. Felicitations were due to Messrs. Mandela and de Klerk who had been deservedly awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace. President Mandela's Government needed all possible support to improve the national economy, to reduce joblessness and to provide homes and amenities for the citizens of the country. The Employers' members had taken note of the Government's reconstruction and development programme for reorganizing and democratizing the society, including an economic development programme that promised to provide employment and job training for 2.5 million people in public works projects, to construct a million new houses, to provide a million others with running water, to bring electricity to 2.5 million more homes and to provide free and compulsory education for children and adult education for millions of blacks. Eradication of the legacy of apartheid would take many years and would require enormous resources. The Employers' members proposed that the Committee, in its conclusions, note with satisfaction the Governing Body's decision, at its 259th Session (March 1994), to recommend that an extra 1 million dollars for technical assistance to South Africa be made available out of the financial surplus. It was also appropriate to refer to paragraph 47 (17) of the conclusions of the Committee's report adopted by the Conference at its 80th Session (1993). In this regard, the Committee should express the hope that the ILO would, in rendering this assistance, respond to the needs of the constituents, which would cover, inter alia, the following: the promotion of trade union and human rights; trade union and employers' association capacity-building; employment creation; the promotion of self-employment and small and medium-sized enterprises; the reform and restructuring of labour market institutions and labour administration; the effective use of all factors of production; the improvement of labour legislation and the upgrading of labour standards; the improvement of working and living conditions in the rural areas and for farmworkers; education and training; human resources development and management training; the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment; and occupational safety and health. The Committee should also recommend to the Conference that the ILO continue to assist democratic trade unions and employers' organizations. Fraternal greetings were extended to Business South Africa, the multiracial employers' association formed by 16 major business groups on 12 April 1994. This year, the Committee was called upon to undertake a review of the Declaration. The Employers' members considered that the Declaration had been rendered academic by the salutary events and developments in the country. It would therefore be appropriate to rescind the Declaration. As a corollary, it was also appropriate to dismantle and abolish this Committee.

9. The Workers' members welcomed South Africa's readmission to membership of the ILO, which was an important event for both the Organization and the country. In order that a resolution might be formulated to rescind the Declaration and to adopt a plan of action, the Workers' members proposed that a tripartite working group be established, composed of representatives of each of the groups. The Workers' members considered that the resolution should recognize that while significant changes had occurred in South Africa, there was a need for the ILO to develop programmes of activities aimed at removing the inherent and deep-seated inequalities in the structures of the society. Specifically, the Committee should invite the Governing Body to instruct the Director-General to adapt the plan of action approved by the Governing Body to the social and economic needs of post-apartheid South Africa. In implementing the plan, it was important to take fully into account the areas identified in paragraph 47 (17) of the 1993 report of the Committee. The ILO should provide the necessary support and assistance for the effective development of tripartite structures, for independent, strong and non-racial employers' and workers' organizations and for the adoption of labour legislation compatible with ILO standards. The Committee should also seek the creation of a task force to consult with the South African Government and social partners in coordinating and following up the implementation of the ILO technical assistance programme in the transitional period. It was also necessary to ensure cooperation with the agencies of the United Nations system and with employers' and workers' organizations in the planning and execution of assistance programmes, particularly in the areas of human resources development, social protection, health, housing and employment. The Government of South Africa should be encouraged to incorporate the principles laid down in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy and to consider the early ratification and application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations, in particular, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Committee should also resolve to rescind the Declaration.

10. The Honourable T. Mboweni, Minister of Labour of the Republic of South Africa, expressed his pleasure at being among the Government representatives and enjoying the opportunity of participating in the activities of the Committee for the first time. The future of South Africa would be determined by the effectiveness with which the new Government tackled the social and economic consequences of apartheid. It was expected to take more than five years just to develop a coherent educational programme. It would also take a long time before a dent could be made in overcoming the situation of the homeless. Many black people lived in despicable conditions, without roofs, sanitation, or clean water. Alexander township, on the north side of Johannesburg, was one such place where people lived in appalling conditions virtually alongside the sparkling houses of affluent whites. Many children had been traumatized by the apartheid system and unless adequate care was extended to them, there existed the potential for the emergence of a generation with a highly distorted perception of society. It was still necessary to face President Mandela's challenge of walking once more a few miles to strengthen democracy and to ensure normalization. That assistance would also enable South Africa to contribute to the region for the mutual benefit and development of all peoples. It was hoped that an appropriate policy framework for the implementation of a programme of technical cooperation could be devised as a building block to create a society in which social justice prevails.

11. The Government member of the Russian Federation expressed great pleasure that the democratic process had triumphed in South Africa with the eradication of the shameful system of apartheid. His country had contributed actively to the historic victory of democracy. As an observer for the United Nations during the South African elections, he himself had participated in 14 electoral centres in the Province of Kwazulu-Natal and was able to observe the extent to which the population considered the elections as an event that promised a better future. He was convinced that South Africa had all of the elements necessary for a peaceful future. The Russian Federation was developing a close relationship of bilateral cooperation with South Africa. The speaker agreed with the conclusions contained in the Director-General's Special Report and with the proposals presented by the Employers' and Workers' members, which, in his opinion, could be combined into a single resolution. The plan of action should be implemented with effective feedback on the extent to which technical cooperation had affected the problems which have to be resolved by the new Government.

12. The Employers' member of South Africa stated that it was the first time for a South African employer to speak in the Committee although in the last few years South African employers had attended as observers. He was grateful for the help received from employers' organizations of many countries and from the ILO in the formation of Business South Africa, and was happy that that organization had been accepted as a member of the International Organization of Employers and by the Pan-African Employers' Confederation. In this regard, he paid particular tribute to Mr. Tom Owuor of the Federation of Kenya Employers and the Secretary-General of the Pan-African Employers' Confederation. He also thanked the Committee for the part it had played in bringing an end to apartheid. He supported the call by the Minister of Labour of South Africa for help in eliminating the legacy of apartheid. Tripartism was alive and well in South Africa, as evidenced by the restructured National Manpower Commission and the National Economic Forum. He recommended the rescission of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and the dissolution of the Committee at the end of its current deliberations.

13. The Government member of the United States congratulated the people of South Africa on their hard fought and rightful transformation into a non-racial, non-sexist democracy. The election of Nelson Mandela as President and the creation of a government of national unity represented a victory of popular will over oppression. He welcomed the readmission of South Africa to the ILO. The Committee should pay attention to what the Labour Minister of South Africa had said about the daunting challenge facing his country — redressing the bitter legacy of apartheid — in the fields of housing, health care, education and basic services. South Africa needed the full support of and assistance from the ILO and the rest of the international community. The ILO was uniquely suited to play a key role, within its areas of competence and expertise, in assisting South Africa to redress the legacy of apartheid, for example, by promoting equality, workers' rights, human rights, development of human resources, labour market institutions, and democratic institutions, and by improving living and working conditions. The Committee should recommend to the Conference a programme of action to respond to South Africa's urgent needs to overcome the bitter legacy of apartheid. The Committee should also recommend the rescission of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid and the abolition of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

14. The Government member of South Africa reiterated the statement of the South African Minister of Labour concerning the need to strengthen the young democracy by urgently tackling the legacy of apartheid. It was important to undo the socio-economic effects of apartheid. In this regard there was an urgent need for ILO technical cooperation and for a programme of action. He reminded the Committee of President Mandela's call for a 100-day programme to show the Government's determination to improve the living conditions of ordinary South Africans, a call which in turn required all the parties to move quickly.

15. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania recalled that, at this time last year, the situation in South Africa was uncertain. The 80th Session of the Conference had mandated the Governing Body to suspend the application of the Declaration on Action against Apartheid in the event of the establishment of an interim government. The Governing Body subsequently did suspend the application of the Declaration in November 1993 pending its review at the present session of the Conference. The April 1994 elections marked the dawn of a new era. He congratulated the people of South Africa and welcomed the country back to the ILO. The legacy of apartheid would take a long time to redress and the ILO must continue its assistance to South Africa. The Government of the United Republic of Tanzania appreciated the role played by the ILO in supporting the South African struggle particularly in the period after the adoption of the Declaration. The success achieved in South Africa was a triumph of the principles of social justice which are central to the existence of the ILO.

16. The Government member of China stated that he was pleased to see a new government in South Africa under the leadership of President Mandela. This had come about as a result of the long struggle by the people of South Africa, a struggle which had been supported by his Government. He expressed the hope that all the people of South Africa would work for the well-being of their country. He expressed appreciation for the role that the ILO had played in the struggle against apartheid and hoped that the ILO would continue to strengthen its cooperation with South Africa by helping in the reconstruction of the country. The Chinese people valued their friendship with the people of South Africa and, on the basis of the principles of peaceful coexistence, looked forward to cooperating with them in labour matters.

17. The observer of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) stated that the Special Report of the Director-General on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa reflected the reality of the situation and the OAU agreed with it. He congratulated the ILO, its member States, employers, workers and the whole international community on the work they had done in the struggle against apartheid. He expressed his appreciation of the dignified and peaceful way in which the people of South Africa and their leaders had overcome an oppressive system and had transformed it into a multiracial and democratic regime. The OAU had always identified itself with the heroic struggle of the South African people for their liberation, and it was happy with the emergence of a united, democratic and non-racial South Africa. In his opinion, the Committee on Action against Apartheid had loyally and efficiently accomplished its task and there was no longer any reason for its existence. However, he wished to see a new mechanism established in its place to monitor the evolution of the situation in South Africa. He expressed the OAU's support for the ILO plan of action to assist the reconstruction of South Africa.

18. The Government representative of Namibia (Mr. H. Witbooi, Minister of Labour and Human Resources Development) was happy that South Africa had rejoined the ILO and he congratulated the ILO for its sterling support in the struggle against apartheid. He welcomed the Special Report of the Director-General on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid. He noted that the legacy of apartheid would take a long time to eradicate and considered that the ILO should give vigorous financial and technical assistance to the people of South Africa. It was necessary to help build the institutional and technical capacity of employers' and workers' organizations in South Africa so that they could play a role in the rebuilding of the country. Recalling that his country had also fought against apartheid for many years, the speaker expressed his deep appreciation for the continuous hard work, the comradeship and cooperation of the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons and for the assistance and service of the Office during the years that this Committee had been meeting.

19. The observer of the Palestinian Liberation Organization welcomed the election of President Mandela in the full, free, multiracial elections in South Africa, which had effectively ended the apartheid system. There had been an identical struggle for freedom in South Africa and in Palestine. In view of the shared interests and goals of the two countries, the speaker wished to keep the Committee abreast of the struggle being waged by the Palestinian people: though many challenges remained, a new phase had been reached in the revolutionary march towards democracy. It was because of the cohesion between the Palestinian people and others who were struggling for independence and democracy that these noble ideals would prevail.

20. The Committee set up a Working Party to prepare a draft resolution for the Committee. It was composed of five Government members: Greece, Malaysia, South Africa, the United Republic of Tanzania and the United States; five Employers' members: Mr. Botha (South Africa), Mr. Cheshire (United Kingdom), Miss Hak (Netherlands), Mr. Hernandez (Philippines) and Mr. Owuor (Kenya); and five Workers' members: Mr. Brett (United Kingdom), Mr. Ngcukana (South Africa), Mr. O'Farrell (United States), Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe) and Ms. Zettervall-Thapper (Sweden). The Reporter of the Committee acted as Chairperson of the Working Party and subsequently introduced the text of the draft resolution agreed upon by it.

21. The General Secretary of the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU), speaking to the adoption of the report, considered that none of the laudatory work of the Committee could have been accomplished without the sterling contribution of the Workers' members, who had enjoyed excellent leadership. He commended the leadership of all of those who had chaired the Committee and the groups, and the participation of the Employers' and Government members. The South African Minister of Labour had indicated that the workers of the country had a real role to play in the long process of development. South African workers also had to learn how to support others in need. It was hoped that the technical assistance to be undertaken by the ILO would take account of the need to ensure trade union rights, a fundamental part of human rights. The speaker believed that, on the basis of the resolution before the Committee, all the groups present would be able to say with pride that apartheid would never again be a problem to be faced. Although there would never again be a situation where the workers of South Africa needed so much support, there would be occasions to collaborate and work together cooperatively in international fora.

22. The Employers' member of Kenya, expressing his support for the report and draft resolution, referred to the memorable role played by the various persons who had chaired the Employers' and Workers' groups over the years, including one of the first Employers' Vice-Chairpersons, Mr. S.R. Da Silva, and the long-time Workers' Vice-Chairperson, Ms. Shirley Carr. The speaker also paid tribute to the excellent contribution of the current Workers' Vice-Chairperson, Mr. Bill Brett, and of Mr. Benildo Hernandez, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson. The international community should acknowledge the role played by the South African private business community in promoting the democratic process in the country. Business South Africa should be accorded a particular tribute for having formed a multiracial employers' association in which all business groups were well represented.

23. The Committee concluded that it should adopt its report and the draft resolution elaborated by the Working Party and annexed to this report.

24. The Workers' members paid tribute to the excellent leadership provided to the Committee by those who had chaired it over the years and to the present Chairperson who had conducted the proceedings with elegance and diplomacy. They expressed gratitude to all of their colleagues for their support and, in particular, to those from South Africa. A tribute was due to the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, Mr. Benildo Hernandez, for his calm and steady leadership and to Ms. Cornélie Hak for her drive and strong commitment. It was important that the role played by private business in South Africa in pushing for reform not go unrecognized. The South African delegation to the Conference had provided an enviable example of tripartism, which augured well for the future development of the country. They also thanked Mr. Faisal Abdel-Rahman, Assistant Director-General, and the staff of the Office for their devotion and cooperation.

25. The Employers' members associated themselves with the Workers' members in conveying to each member of the Committee and to all members of the Office staff, deep appreciation for having worked over the years to reach what was, initially, a difficult task. The history of the ILO would record the fact that the Committee had contributed, in a humble way, to the removal of a system that had been considered a crime against humanity by the United Nations. It was a particular cause for rejoicing that the end of the Committee's work should coincide with the celebration of the 75th Anniversary of the ILO. All of humanity, irrespective of race, creed and colour, had one single conscience and the accomplishment of the Committee was part of the destiny that God has placed with all of us. It was hoped that the Committee's efforts would bear fruit and that the Government, workers and Business South Africa would continue to build up the country.

26. The Government member of South Africa recalled that this day, 16 June, was one of particular significance in the history of South Africa. It was the anniversary of the 1976 Soweto uprising of schoolchildren, the day when many children experienced their first taste — for some, a bloody taste — of struggle as they sacrificed themselves for the cause of freedom and democracy. During the years of apartheid, it had been normal for South African schoolchildren to assume responsibility for pressing for change in the society. In fact, many of those same schoolchildren were now adults, attending the present session of the Conference. All of the South African Employers', Workers' and Government representatives attending the Conference would be as true to the principles of the ILO, as they had been faithful to their ideals at home. The strength of the social partners and tripartite institutions in South Africa was the essential guarantee of democracy in the country. The Committee had seen South African tripartism at work in the Committee. The process was not always easy but it was a fundamental principle of the South African approach. The tripartite constituents of South Africa looked forward with confidence to a fruitful and rewarding relationship with the ILO, although this did not preclude the possibility that they would make waves in the Organization. The speaker expressed gratitude to the Employers' and Workers' members and to the Office. Particular thanks were due to Ms. Hak, who had been a staunch stalwart of this Committee, to Ms. Carr and to the secretariats assisting the two groups.

27. The Reporter thanked the Chairperson and the members of the Committee for the honour of having worked together in the Working Party. Noting that while the events that had brought about the end of this Committee were a cause for celebration, he proposed that the Committee stand for a minute's silence in memory of all of those who had suffered in the struggle against apartheid. This was done.

28. The representative of the Secretary-General paid tribute to the Chairperson's unfailing courtesy and wisdom in conducting the meeting. He also expressed gratitude to the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, Mr. Hernandez, to the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, Mr. Brett, and to the Reporter, Mr. Jonzon. He noted that this year was the tenth occasion on which he had been associated with the Committee; and, it was significant that, in this last session, the Committee had reached a unanimous conclusion whereas, in the past, reservations would have been entered in the plenary discussion, even when a consensus had been reached by the Committee. South Africa had been discussed at every session of the ILO Conference since 1964, but the ILO's pioneering work in the field of human rights dated back to the adoption of the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944. That was the first time an international organization had adopted an instrument dealing with human rights and, in particular, with discrimination. It was only later, in 1948, that the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Given the ILO's concern with discrimination, it was little wonder that the Organization had decided to tackle the problem of apartheid. It was heartening to note that tripartism — the raison d'etre of the ILO — was flourishing in South Africa. He paid tribute to past chairpersons, vice-chairpersons, reporters and other personalities for their contribution to this historic end of the Committee's work, including Shirley Carr, Cornélie Hak, Andrew Kailembo, Bill Brett and Benildo Hernandez. He also thanked his past and present Office colleagues.

29. The Chairperson expressed gratitude to the Committee for having bestowed on Botswana the honour of chairing the Committee at its last, historic meeting. He thanked all of the members of the Committee for their support and paid tribute to his predecessors. It was a pleasure to declare the Committee on Action against Apartheid dissolved and the apartheid system buried.

Geneva, 16 June 1994. (Signed) Mr. P.K. BALOPI, Chairperson.

Reporter.

Resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Acclaiming the holding of the first free and democratic elections in the Republic of South Africa from 26 to 28 April 1994, resulting in the installation of a government of national unity, and the unanimous election on 9 May 1994 of Mr. Nelson Mandela as President of the Republic of South Africa,

Welcoming the readmission of South Africa as a Member of the International Labour Organization,

Noting with satisfaction the intention expressed by the Government of South Africa to recommend the immediate ratification of the ILO Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, discrimination and forced labour,

Paying tribute to the important role played by the ILO and its constituents in the long and arduous struggle for the dismantling of apartheid,

Noting the decision taken by the ILO Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993) to suspend the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, and to adopt a plan of action on assistance to South Africa in the transition to full democracy and in overcoming the effects of apartheid,

Noting further the resolution concerning South Africa adopted by the Eighth African Regional Conference of the ILO in Mauritius from 19 to 26 January 1994,

Conscious that the legacy of apartheid will take many years to eradicate and that vast resources will be required to provide for basic needs and to promote equality for all the people in South Africa,

Noting that technical assistance to South Africa for the purpose of overcoming the legacy of apartheid must be developed in consultation with the tripartite constituents in South Africa, and will be provided at their request, jointly or individually,

Underlining the need for the ILO to develop, in consultation with the tripartite constituents of South Africa, a programme of action aimed at assisting in the removal of the inherent and deep-seated inequalities in the structures of South African society,

Recognizing that the democratic exigencies of the transformation process from apartheid to a free, united and democratic society place a heavy responsibility on the shoulders of the tripartite South African social partners in the rebuilding and development of the country,

Convinced of the urgent need for the international community to commit itself to support fully the process of reconstruction and development in South Africa as that country enters the first stage of the post-apartheid era,

Considering that the recent political democratic developments have paved the way for the full respect of freedom and dignity of all human beings in South Africa, irrespective of race, creed or sex;

1. Rescinds forthwith the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the International Labour Conference on 8 July 1964 and revised on 18 June 1981, 16 June 1988 and 20 June 1991, and consequently decides to dissolve forthwith the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid;

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:

(a) to adapt, in consultation with the tripartite constituents in South Africa, the plan of action approved by the Governing Body at its 258th Session (November 1993) to the social and economic development needs of post-apartheid South Africa, with special attention, inter alia, to the following:

- the promotion of trade union and human rights;

- improvement of working and living conditions in the rural areas and for farmworkers;
- education and training, in particular vocational training;
- human resources development and management training;
- promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment; and
- occupational health and safety;

(b) to consult with the South African Government and employers' and workers' organizations to ensure that all appropriate action is taken to bring about the implementation of the ILO plan of action, and to report at regular intervals to the Governing Body on its follow-up;

(c) to coordinate with the agencies of the United Nations system in the planning and execution of programmes of socio-economic assistance to South Africa, particularly in the areas of human resources development, entrepreneurship development, social protection, health, housing, education, employment, promotion of equality and other basic needs;

(d) to encourage the Government of South Africa and the employers' and workers' organizations to implement the principles laid down in the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy to attract new investment;

(e) to provide the necessary support and assistance for the strengthening of tripartite structures, and of independent, strong and non-racial employers' and workers' organizations;

(f) to provide the necessary support and assistance to the tripartite constituents in South Africa to assist them in the adoption of labour legislation and other measures which are compatible with international labour standards, and to allow them to consider ratification of appropriate Conventions; in particular, to assist them to comply with those recommendations of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association concerning South Africa which have not yet been implemented, in accordance with the conclusions and recommendations of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association;

EIGHTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on the agenda is the eighth report of the Selection Committee, contained in Provisional Record No. 3G.

I would like to submit this report to you for adoption. If there are no objections, may I take it that the report is adopted?

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT: We shall now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. BASS (Employers' delegate, Antigua and Barbuda) – I should like to congratulate the President and his Officers on your election to preside over this historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and to wish them every success in carrying out its programme of work.

Once again, the Director-General is to be congratulated for the excellence of his Report which, fittingly, is devoted this year to consideration of the future role of our Organization in the emerging new world economic order and beyond.

The urgency with which he states his case requires a response from this session of the Conference and I shall return to some aspects of his Report shortly in my brief address.

But first, permit me to convey the sincere congratulations of, and greetings from, the Antigua Employers' Federation on the occasion of the celebration by our Organization of its 75th anniversary as well as the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. For us, in the Caribbean region, there is added cause to celebrate another birthday in the chronicles of ILO history, and that is that October this year will mark the 25th anniversary of the establishment in Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, of a subregional office to serve ILO constituents in our Caribbean region.

During this past 25 years the contribution of the ILO to the development of public labour and employment policies in the Caribbean has been outstanding. This fact, regrettably, all too often fails to be reflected in the texts of International Labour Office studies, reports and publications. As a result, the positive impact of the ILO's technical interventions on the comparative development of public labour policies and labour-management relations in the region have been left largely unnoticed. For example, employers and their organizations in the subregion these past 25 years have worked diligently and cooperatively with governments and trade unions to contribute to the economic development of the subregion with relatively impressive results, not only in terms of measurable improvements in the living standards and quality of life of the Caribbean working peoples, but also as regards the respect which has been accorded basic human rights and freedoms, especially the absence of forced labour and the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively with their employers in the process of social and economic development, thus helping to strengthen the bulwarks of civil society in the region.

Alas, the fairly high standards of living of the Caribbean peoples, when measured by the size of the gross domestic product per capita, especially in the case of the very small island States, may now be threatened by the speed of economic globalization and its attendant conditionalities which ostensibly seek to promote economic competitiveness through the liberalization of international trade in goods and services, the deregulation of money markets to facilitate the freer movement of investment and financial flows, and the settlement of foreign debt obligations by member States in the developing world.

As the Director-General rightly points in his Report, many developing countries could suffer in the emerging global economy on account of this new pattern of economic development since they lack the necessary socio-economic infrastructure, especially as regards the education and training of the human resources which would facilitate a smoother integration of the economies of these countries into the global economy on an internationally competitive basis. It is paradoxical that many of our countries, with GDP per capita which places them in the ranks of the middle-income countries, should still be rudimentary producers of primary commodities or, as is the case of my own country, be dependent on tourism as their sole or principal source of employment and income generation. Efforts are being made to remedy the vulnerability of these economies through diversification and regional economic integration, but obstacles to the free movement of people is a serious constraint and is probably a factor which impedes investment flows within the region, leading to a new division of labour and job creation. Caribbean economic integration would appear, therefore, to require a review of the labour legislation and industrial relations systems in the several island communities as an added means of promoting compatibility between social protection and the imperative of attracting an adequate flow of investment capital to productive activities so as to improve the productivity of enterprises throughout the region.

We will hope to draw on the unique technical resources of the International Labour Office as we attempt to overcome the obstacles to achieving higher levels of enterprise productivity and sustainable development. The universality of the International Labour Organization seems assured when considered in the context of the share of world population which is represented by its growing organizational membership. But this indicator masks certain weaknesses concerning the attendance and participation by full tripartite delegations of member States in the work of the annual International Labour Conference due to the relatively high costs of attendance, which are exacerbated by the declining performance of the economies of many developing countries, especially small island States and other States which are caught up in the grips of structural adjustment policies, for example a number of member States of our Caribbean region.

We do hope that at some point in the near future we will find a workable solution to this problem.

It has been observed that an increasing number of delegations from Caribbean member States have not been able to attend the International Labour Conference for its full duration each session. This development has placed the employers' and workers' delegations attending sessions of the Conference at a disadvantage, since they are unable to participate fully in the work of each session and especially in the work of the technical committees of the Conference. Also, the circumstances just mentioned as affecting participation in the Conference by Employers' and Workers' delegations of Caribbean member States have had, in recent years, a further adverse effect on the situation of national employers' organizations in the smallest of the Caribbean member States. Due to financial considerations, they have been unable to be represented fully at the international level by employers' organizations which enjoy consultative status in this Organization.

For these reasons the Antigua Employers' Federation has a keen interest in the outcome of the discussion of that part of the Director-General's Report concerning possibilities for the better selection and discussion of subjects which may be appropriate for international regulation. In particular, the suggestion that preliminary soundings of opinion may be carried out in the field through the organization of technical meetings appears to be useful and is supported by my Federation.

We consider that such meetings could be arranged on a regional or subregional basis, with the full involvement of employers' and workers' organizations and the ILO's multidisciplinary teams in the area. Also, other sources of expertise in the region such as technical experts, the universities, the management training institutes and other relevant institutions should be invited to be associated with this innovation in an endeavour to obtain the best information on the likely response of the social partners in respect of subjects on which international labour standards are contemplated.

The Antigua Employers' Federation extends congratulations to the peoples of South Africa on the success of their first democratically held general election. We also wish President Nelson Mandela and his Government and the peoples of South Africa success in their future political and socio-economic development.

Also, the contributions made by the International Labour Organization to the efforts of democratization in South Africa are noteworthy and justify the highest commendation and approbation.

We in the Caribbean look forward to the formation of strong employers' organizations and would welcome an opportunity for the Caribbean employers' organizations to support the development of these bodies in any beneficial way which our limited resources would permit.

Finally, the Antigua Employers' Federation wishes to record its grateful thanks to Mr. Hans Hammar, the Director of the Bureau of Employers' Activities, and his staff, as well as to the Director of the Caribbean Office and the multidisciplinary team for the greater attention which our requests for technical cooperation have received since the appointment of a specialist for employers' activities in the Caribbean Office in 1992.

This augurs well for future cooperation between Caribbean employers' organizations and the International Labour Organization. We will therefore continue to support the ILO's activities in the region, and offer our sincere wishes for the continued success of the work of this great institution as it prepares itself to meet the challenges to labour and social development in the next millennium.

Mr. THYGESEN (Employers' adviser, Denmark) – Allow me first of all, on behalf of the Danish Employers' delegation, to congratulate the President very warmly on his election to this position: I wish him every success in his task.

Let me also congratulate the Director-General for having selected a highly important theme for his Report to this Conference. I am indeed happy that the employers' proposals for a reform of the ILO, presented in March last year, have now prompted the Director-General to recognize that there is a need for change, and, in that light, to take a close look on how to redirect the work of the ILO.

In his Report, the Director-General points to the new challenges facing the ILO, that is the changing world caused by the disappearance of, first of all, the communist bloc, the globalization of the economy and technological development.

The Report takes a rather pessimistic view on this development. It is suggested that social problems will grow in this rapidly changing world. I on the contrary see the world of today as a world of new and brighter opportunities than we have seen for many years. That of course does not mean that all serious problems have been eliminated. But progress towards a better world with more freedom and greater welfare for all will not happen without changes.

How may the ILO contribute to these changes? And what should be the role of the ILO in this changing world?

First of all, it has to be recognized that it is of great importance that social development is based upon productive enterprise activity. Without this there will be no economic growth and employment creation. Top priority must therefore be given to promoting needs, the teams should be there to listen to them – to quote Chapter 4 of the Director-General's Report, the ILO should be "an organization at the service of its constituents".

We are well aware of the unique and important role that the ILO has played in its 75 years of existence. Norwegian employers appreciate the way in which this Organization has brought representatives of workers and employers together, the assistance which has been given to countries and groups with difficult labour relations, and also the ILO's instrumental role in creating hope and peace in our world. The ILO very much deserved to receive the Nobel Peace Prize in Oslo in 1969.

Having said this about the global achievements of the ILO, I hope that you appreciate that we also wish for this Organization to be of practical use to its Members. Only then can the ILO have our support in the years to come.

Mr. MOLOPO (Minister of Labour and Employment, Lesotho) – May I, on behalf of my delegation, the people and Government of Lesotho, and on my own behalf, congratulate the President and the Officers of the Conference for their unanimous election to the presidency of this 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. Through their great experience in labour matters, I have no doubt that they will bring the deliberations of this Conference to a successful conclusion.

My congratulations also go to the Director-General of the ILO, and the Governing Body and all officials of the ILO for the well-prepared reports, excellent facilities and the exhibitions displayed at this historic 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

These celebrations coincide with the admission of new member States to the ILO, in particular, the readmission of the Republic of South Africa after a long time of isolation from this reputable Organization. The readmission of the Republic of South Africa is a great pleasure to my country, Lesotho, not only because of our close proximity, but also because we have close cultural and socio-economic ties. We congratulate the Republic of South Africa most sincerely for successfully conducting a free and fair election process recently, which has ushered in the present democratic Government. We are happy that now the legitimate Government of the Republic of South Africa can take its rightful place amongst nations, and contribute to world development without hindrance. Above all, we congratulate the ILO and all those who participated in the present change in South Africa. We wish the young democracy of the Republic of South Africa peace and prosperity.

I have read with great interest the documents prepared by the Director-General and his staff. The choice of the theme, Defending values, promoting change, could not have been made at a more appropriate time than now. Our celebration of these two anniversaries is a suitable time to pause and reflect on our past and present and to map out new strategies for the future of the ILO. The statement, I repeat, Defending values, promoting change, appears to be contradictory at first sight, but after a more careful analysis, it accurately reflects the type of action that needs to be embarked upon, based on the history and experience of the International Labour Organization.

The development of international Conventions and Recommendations is the greatest contribution that the ILO has made to the world of work. Standard setting is in fact the reason for the existence of the ILO. These instruments have provided useful guidelines in promoting harmony and standardization in conditions of employment throughout the world. Some of these Conventions address key human rights issues, the rights of workers and employers, and have served as important reference points which have stood the test of time in the effective and efficient conduct of labour relations.

Standard setting, together with the tripartite structure of the ILO, as well as its proven experience in technical cooperation activities for its member States, constitute a heritage to be jealously guarded and defended.

There are, however, a large number of Conventions which remain unratified, or which have received a minimum number of ratifications by member States. We therefore need to rethink and examine why this is the case, when these Conventions are freely discussed and adopted by the International Labour Conference each year.

The reasons for reluctance to ratify Conventions are many and varied. However, it may be important to examine the universality of these Conventions, and the gaps between developed and developing countries. Some of these instruments may be totally irrelevant to developing countries, and vice versa. The tendency, however, has been that those who need a Convention should not be prevented – and this is why these instruments contain the flexibility and exclusion clauses.

It is worth noting, however, that an international instrument once established becomes a point of reference. No matter how flexible it may be, it will have an impact and entail some obligations on the part of member States.

Similarly, the new phenomena of globalization of the economy, internationalization of financial markets, trade liberalization and structural adjustment programmes demand new approaches in standard setting, to take account of their impact on the economies of developing countries.

Just as the ILO has suggested linkages between standard setting and technical cooperation activities, some organizations now suggest linkages between international trade and compliance with labour standards. We believe that this linkage can only lead to a decline in trade between developed and developing countries, with overall adverse consequences to the economies of the latter.

In conclusion, we note with appreciation the ILO's efforts in defending the interests of its constituencies, in providing a forum for debate and possibilities of acceptable change. We believe therefore that there is room to review our strategies for the benefit of all.

Original French: Mr. URECHEANU (Workers' delegate, Republic of Moldova) – It is a special honour for me to address you from this rostrum at an historic moment when progressive mankind is celebrating the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

conditions which favour the creation of productive enterprises.

In this context, I think it is extremely important that the ILO policies help structural adjustment – stressing the importance of enterprises in solving the problems we are facing.

Even in countries like Denmark with a high standard of living, where the necessary structural changes should be fairly painless, we see new rigidities developing on the labour market instead of the much needed flexibility that could help to create employment and growth.

Without a solution of the employment problem, I believe that little –and I really mean little – of what governments can do nationally and internationally in the ILO that would have any impact for the people of our countries. It is equally important for the ILO to defend the spirit of entrepreneurship in the world.

I do not think that this has been taken sufficiently into account in the Report. It is an irrefutable fact that employment promotion and the role of private enterprises are given very little attention.

The same can be said about the role of employers in the ILO's personnel policy. To increase the impact and credibility of the ILO it is necessary to correct the present imbalance and give employers a role equal to that enjoyed by workers for years.

Enterprises need flexibility in order to be able to adjust to rapidly changing circumstances. How does the standard-setting system of the ILO fit this goal? I would suggest that in many cases the international labour Conventions have exceeded their legitimate task of giving appropriate protection to workers and have become an obstacle to the creation of jobs. I think the Conventions have been far too detailed.

It is a well-known fact that the level of ratification has been persistently low and declining which means that the Conventions have lost influence and significance for the ILO's constituents. I am in no doubt that one of the reasons for the decline in ratification is the tendency to develop increasingly detailed Conventions.

This is why the International Organization of Employers (IOE) has suggested a review of the ILO standards policy. A key element in this review is the proposal to limit international labour standards to general principles on which there is a broad consensus without going into details. Such standards would be easier to ratify and apply effectively. And it would also be in compliance with the prevailing tendency to "deregulate" in many ILO member States.

In my view, the ILO's standard-setting activities should be closely reviewed from all angles. Should we carry on adopting Conventions at the same speed as now? If we do, we would in my view run the risk of further reducing the impact of existing Conventions. Instead, we should take a look at those Conventions which are old and outdated and either update or drop them.

Although the ILO's standard-setting activity is an important one, we should not forget that the ILO performs other important functions. For instance, technical assistance remains just as important as standards as a means of helping ILO member States.

There are other areas where I do not see a role for the ILO. The debate on social clauses is cropping up in different international fora, including the ILO. Of course, we all want to end child labour, forced labour, discrimination and violations of the freedom of association. But to link international labour standards and trade practices would, in my view, entail major risks for the multilateral trade system which is vital for economic development in both industrialized and developing countries.

I am convinced that an open trade system is the best way, in the countries accused of social dumping, of maximizing the growth needed to ensure the resources which are essential to raise living standards and improve working conditions. There must be other ways of tackling this problem.

In conclusion, I would like to repeat the need for the ILO to stand up to the challenges facing it. In order to have an importance for its member States and the social partners, the ILO must adapt to the changes. I would like to see the ILO give top priority to the market economy and private enterprise.

Mr. DAVIES (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom) – I would like to extend my congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of the Conference, and congratulations to the ILO on reaching its 75th anniversary and for taking this opportunity to rethink its role in a world very different from the one which witnessed its creation in 1919. Despite its long history, the ILO's activities are still relatively little known and even less well understood in comparison with other – younger – United Nations bodies and with other multilateral organizations concerned with business and social issues. The British employers, as founder members, welcome the opportunity to join with our colleagues in a frank discussion of the issues surrounding the future development of the Organization.

The ILO is now at a crossroads. The direction we choose will determine whether it will succeed in retaining its interest and relevance to its constituents. The ILO needs to recognize the process of dynamic change in the world of work and to consider how it can help, not hinder, such change.

Standard setting has traditionally enjoyed pride of place at the heart of the ILO's activities. But it is sensible from time to time to take a look at the habits we have formed over the years and to consider whether they suit our current environment.

The ILO's standard-setting role is showing signs of age – so of course are many of us delegates, but we try not to let that slow us down. Too many of the standards adopted at annual Conferences, particularly in recent years, are intricately worked in exquisite detail, but serve no useful purpose because they are not ratified.

The Director-General rightly observes in his Report this year that: "It is not enough merely to produce standards. For standards must be ratified and applied." He also adds that: "it is incumbent on us to re-evaluate the relevance of our legislative function, its effectiveness and its suitability in today's world."

When the ratification rate of standards is down to 15 per cent, we should consider whether the approach we are adopting and the machinery we have at our disposal remain appropriate. In particular, when member organizations are seeing traditional relationships between employer and employee replaced by a spectrum of more flexible arrangements, what is the value of rigid standards, particularly if adopted in situations very different to those we work

Looking back after all these years, we can review the course covered by our Organization and define the new objectives which we have to attain in reaching our final end, namely the introduction of social equality throughout the world of today and tomorrow. To remain viable and not one day experience a crisis, the ILO must confront all the acute problems which arise from the changes taking place in the world today. These serious and complex problems vary from one country to another.

In what follows, I wish to speak of the situation in my own young country, the Republic of Moldova. At a time when it has become a sovereign State and is reorganizing its economy with a view to introducing a free market, the social situation has deteriorated considerably. All spheres of activity are in crisis, and the national economy is in a critical state.

Industrial production by volume dropped by nearly 30 per cent in the first three months of this year; hence unemployment has shot up. Most undertakings of the military and industrial complex of the former Soviet Union in Moldova have been shut down. Many undertakings in other sectors are no longer in operation, either because of a lack of raw materials or the absence of a market for their goods. As a result, thousands of workers are sent off on unpaid leave which may last for months. Even those who are working are paid after a delay of several months. In the meantime the value of these wages has been reduced to almost nothing by inflation.

Estimates have revealed that the figures for hidden unemployment will reach 300,000 by the end of this year, and that for a country where the total population does not exceed 4,500,000.

So we can speak of the total pauperization of our people. At present, the minimum wage in Moldova is US$3, and the average wage is no more than US$17. On such a wage even survival is a struggle. So you can well imagine the straits to which Moldovan trade unions have been reduced.

The Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Moldova, which I have the honour of representing here for the first time, takes a responsible stand towards the problems confronting our country. We are constantly demanding that the authorities undertake specific action designed to ensure the full application of the law of Moldovan Republic on the indexation of earnings; government and employer observance of all the provisions of the general agreement; the creation of material and financial conditions conducive to normal operation of undertakings; in the reciprocal repayment of debts owed by undertakings in the Republic; and, lastly, an increase in the minimum wage and other earnings.

The Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Moldova is in favour of economic reform, but we always demanded that such reforms should be introduced at a minimum cost to society and that the most vulnerable sections of the population should not be made to suffer.

Tripartite machinery has a part to play in solutions to the problems relating to the protection of the interests of the wage earner, because social equality in the sphere of labour can only be ensured by cooperation between employers and workers in the process of looking for appropriate solutions.

The key to the solution of this problem lies in negotiation, and this is the principal instrument resorted to by the Moldovan trade unions.

But if employers and workers are to get legal support enabling them to establish social stability in the country, there must be strict respect for international law, and especially for the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organization. However, these can only become binding on the legislative and executive powers of our country if they have been ratified by Parliament.

Unfortunately, the Republic of Moldova has so far ratified only one Convention out of the 174 that exist, and has still to ratify Convention No. 105 on the abolition of forced labour.

I should like to mention that the trade unions of Moldova, jointly with the Government, have submitted 22 of the most important ILO Conventions for ratification.

Despite all these complicated problems, we realize that this transition period is not easy. It might have been easier, if the Government had listened more democratically to all sectors of the population before taking economic decisions which are important for everybody.

This is the course on which our trade unions have embarked, hence we would be very glad of any assistance and support granted by the International Labour Office in this connection.

Finally, may I wish success to the International Labour Conference in accomplishing its noble mission of bringing about social equality throughout the world.

Original French: Mr. DIOP (Workers' delegate, Senegal) – The workers' delegation of Senegal is honoured to participate in the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the ILO. On behalf of my delegation, I should like to warmly congratulate the President on his outstanding election as President of the 81st Session of the Conference.

The Director-General's Report, entitled Defending values, promoting change, appeals to our consciences. It is appropriate that at a time when values are disappearing and we are losing our bearings, the ILO, this august body of social dialogue, is standing up to defend the banner of social justice.

For a long time, for a very long time indeed, some of the fundamental values of humanity, namely solidarity and fraternity, have in fact ceased to exist in an ever-changing world.

We would be glad if the end of apartheid, which has become a reality today in South Africa, could mark an end to injustice, violation of human rights and peoples' rights and put an end to this wave of self-destruction and genocide which has been unleashed throughout the world.

We hope that the presence at this Conference of a strong multiracial delegation from South Africa will finally arouse the world's conscience against hypocrisy, egoism, exclusion and the ideologies of ethnic cleansing.

The events in Rwanda and in the former Yugoslavia are today a matter of utmost concern for the international community, and rightly so. Nevertheless, there are also risks of a major disruption of the social fabric in a number of countries in Africa under the humiliating yoke of the Bretton Woods institutions and a number of financial backers. Over more than ten years, the African States have repeatedly failed in their attempts to apply the structural adjustment policies imposed on African governments by inter-in today? Is our approach in need of adaptation and modification?

The Director-General acknowledges that it is time to consider whether the pace of our standard-setting needs to be maintained. In the view of British employers, it would be a mistake for the ILO to maintain its current approach of agreeing on a Convention on a new topic each year. Instead of looking for new topics we should be asking ourselves whether there is scope for updating and consolidating the Conventions adopted by past Conferences on topics still relevant to the concerns of the ILO's member organizations, but where the shelf life of the original has long since expired.

In the brief time I have this morning, I would like to mention one other important problem: the connection between labour standards and trade. It is, of course, not a new issue for the ILO, dating back to its founding in 1919; but this year the GATT agreement has given it new life.

The question of social clauses in international trade agreements is a highly complex one on which we should not rush to adopt entrenched positions. The Director-General notes that some argue that the ILO should resist the temptation to be drawn into this treacherous territory. But the United States Government, among others, has said that it believes that the ILO has a critical role to play in any effort to ensure that the benefits of expanded trade and economic growth are shared by workers, and that it supports joint ILO/WTO work on this issue.

Our point of view is somewhat more cautious. In this area, we think our former colony in North America is on the wrong track. We think there are considerable hazards involved in attempting to impose standards on emerging economies which could hold back their economic development. There is a dangerous borderline between the legitimate desire to see better conditions for workers in these countries and the territory of those who would argue for protection and would eagerly accept the cloak of respectability provided by the involvement of an organization such as the ILO to provide cover for their arguments. As the United States Government has recognized, the interaction between labour standards and trade agreements raises complex and sensitive questions which will take time to address.

So we should be considering carefully the principles behind any proposals put forward, and equally importantly their practical implications. We need to be sure about the answers to a number of key questions: precisely what would a social clause or clauses be aiming to achieve? Would they be likely to achieve the desired effect? Are there other measures which might do so more efficiently? Who would be responsible for monitoring the effectiveness of social clauses? What might be the knock-on effects on other aspects of trade policy? What would the long-term impact be on the nature of the ILO itself?

And we should not consider the introduction of social clauses unless we are confident that this would not unduly constrain countries' ability to secure a free-trading environment for their resident businesses, and thereby enhance the economic well-being of their citizens and their trading partners' citizens. We know that the route to higher standards of living is via sustainable economic activity which creates wealth and productive employment. We, like most of the ILO's member organizations, are acutely aware of the dangers of introducing measures which increase labour market rigidity and inhibit job creation.

We could not claim, by any means, that we know the answers to all these difficult questions about the effect of social clauses on trade. The GATT Director-General has said that the ultimate aims lying behind such proposals would be better served by concentrating on helping emerging nations to raise standards by means of resource transfers than through the introduction of social clauses. There is certainly scope for further investigation of that approach. In his Report, he rightly points out that at its foundation the ILO was deliberately not given the role of enforcement officer in questions of differential standards affecting trade between nations.

The risk of giving protectionist tendencies a respectable guise by association with the ILO is great. There is a strong case for considering social issues along with the environmental and other questions raised by the increasing interdependence of nations in economic terms.

Robert Reich, the United States Secretary of Labor, himself suggested in his speech to the Symposium of International Labour Standards and Global Integration on 25 April of this year that trade sanctions should only be invoked where labour standards persist despite economic growth, and where the weakness or absence of democratic institutions gives ground for belief that living conditions are suppressed by policy not poverty. He is, therefore, quite clearly arguing for a political test based on assessment of the quality of democratic institutions in another country. That would take the ILO into entirely new territory in which it is not currently equipped to travel.

As a founder member, the United Kingdom and the Confederation of British Industry (CBI), as its employer representative, is pleased to have preserved a constructive working relationship with colleagues in the ILO – a membership whose breath and commitment have contributed greatly to the quality of the Organization's output over the last 75 years. But we were rather disappointed to read the criticisms of multinational enterprises contained in the Director-General's Report. The ILO's own detailed studies suggest a more balanced view of the activities of these companies.

The ILO remains a valuable forum in which important issues can and should be discussed by genuine and committed representatives of the three key players in each member country's social structure. We hope that this Conference will make progress on the important issues under discussion, and that the ILO will succeed in carving out for itself a valuable role to play in the changing international environment, and one which will take it forward into its next 75 years.

Original French: Mr. LETTIERI (Workers' delegate, Italy) – I should like to congratulate the President on his election, an event of great significance for the world of work.

I should first like to say, on behalf of the three Italian trade union confederations, the CGIL, the CISL and the UIL, that the Italian Workers share the views expressed and the conclusions reached by Mr. Michel Hansenne, the Director-General, in his Report. We wish to congratulate him on his enlightened and committed work.

As far as one of the key topics of this Conference is concerned, namely the social clause, I am fully convinced that the arguments put forward in support of it are irrefutable. It is not a matter of imposing uniform nit-picking rules on any country. Suffice it to refer to the statement made by Mr. Reich, Minister of Labor of the United States, in which he clarified and confirmed that it is a matter of ensuring respect for the standards or principles which, at the end of the twentieth century, ought to be considered as a kind of natural right of our civilization.

How can anyone query the principle of free labour as opposed to forced labour, the prohibition of child labour or the right of workers to associate freely in their workplace and to negotiate salaries and working conditions?

If there are still reservations or even objections to these basic aspects of the dignity of working men and women, we are obviously not dealing with some kind of misunderstanding but rather with more deep-rooted and disquieting motives, to which I would briefly like to draw your attention.

This year we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the foundation of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. But the very first affirmation of that historic Declaration is that labour is not "a commodity". This is an important and seminal statement, which has served as the basis for the modern concept of the right to work and freedom of association as instruments designed to restore the balance of forces in the labour market.

But unfortunately it is this very affirmation, of such fundamental importance for our civilization or for what is called the "European social model", that is already being called in question and swept aside by neo-liberal ideologies.

We are witnessing a gradual depreciation of human labour. Deregulation and the scaling-down of social legislation, conventional safeguards and the welfare state are all aspects of an economic and social theory that constitutes the prevailing ideology of conservative policies and, unfortunately, of international financial institutions.

This is the era of the globalization of the market economy. There is, however, a fundamental contradiction in the globalization process. It has emerged as a movement for liberalization in response to the ending of the division of the world into colonial empires, such as the former European empires, or the more recent collapse of the Soviet Empire. But although the end of the empires generated so much hope, globalization is a process controlled by strong interests and a neo-liberal ideology bent on overturning the regulations and social achievements of the past 150 years, which are the legacy of Western democracy. And it is this very concept of democracy that is being jeopardized by the use of the process of globalization of markets for unsavoury purposes.

If globalization is abandoned to market forces, the market will be wild and unregulated, a place where the power of the strongest is enhanced and the powerlessness of the weak is exacerbated.

Unregulated globalization, without institutions to restore balance, is a source of growing world disorder. Since the last century, these institutions have been nation States, trade unions and, to a certain extent, international organizations. Without these institutions, persons looking for work under the unbalanced conditions of supply and demand that characterize the world labour market have no way of protecting themselves. We are witnessing a return to the situation that prevailed at the time of the first industrial revolution. The frontiers opened up by globalization resemble a new Wild West, but this time at the global level. Millions of men and women, uprooted from the land or from traditional industries, are reduced in the name of efficiency and competitiveness to a marginal existence and to poverty and despair in the southern hemisphere and more recently in Eastern Europe. Our aim is not, of course, to halt the trend towards internationalization of the economy and of markets, but rather to regulate the process.

What is taking place today is the reverse: international financial institutions impose deregulation both on the North and on the South, obviously with tremendous coercive force in the case of the weakest populations – precisely those who most urgently need assistance of a kind that should usually be provided in a regional context.

Structural adjustment plans based on deflation, privatization, the elimination of aid to sectors in the process of being modernized and the reduction of social expenditure, plans formulated and imposed by the IMF, are to blame for growing impoverishment in most countries of the South and East and social and political tensions which fuel nationalist, ethnocentric and fundamentalist movements.

Under these circumstances, I would urge first and foremost an increase and not a reduction in the role of an organization such as the ILO. Provision should be made for intervention to control the social impact, particularly on employment and working conditions, of the adjustment and assistance plans imposed on developing countries or countries in transition.

This should be an essential component, indeed a prerequisite, for the application of the principle of tripartism. We stress the importance of tripartite agreements in advanced industrial countries, such as the agreement on income and labour policies signed in Italy in July 1993. We should provide in a consistent way for the participation of the social partners, and trade unions in particular, the formulation of adjustment policies and in determining their impact in countries that have to engage in a major development effort.

Secondly, in accordance with the concept of tripartism, we have to step up efforts to promote free trade unions, a cornerstone of any action to restore balance between capital and labour or to ensure the smooth functioning of a pluralistic and democratic society.

Lastly, I think that, in advance of the Copenhagen Summit and in accordance with the proposal by Mr. Jacques Delors, we will have to work on the idea of creating an economic security council representing the most important countries of the South and East in order to make the social clauses effective and in order to eliminate the obstacles impeding economic development and social progress by regulating the process of globalization and regionalization of markets. These are the circumstances in which we see the ILO playing a very prominent role in defending and enhancing the dignity of human labour in response to the challenges of the twenty-first century.

Original Spanish: Mr. OBREGON SABOGAL (Workers' delegate, Colombia) – We would like to express our pleasure on behalf of the colombian workers to our fellow worker, Mr. Charles Gray, Director, International Affairs Department of the AFL-CIO, on his election to chair this anniversary session of the International Labour Conference.

"Universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice", according to the Constitution of the ILO. Now we are celebrating 75 years of this Organization in a complex framework of unforeseen change, a global employment crisis, globalization of markets, and an increase in absolute poverty. More than at any other time, we need to call for the social imagination referred to by Pope Paul VI.

The globalization of social action, in particular the incorporation of social clauses in international trade agreements and the social regulation of the global economy, are tasks which fall to the ILO more than every before. The Organization must insist on its fundamental values and not relent in its efforts. In 75 years social injustice has not been eradicated, which means we must continue our struggle without respite.

The Director-General of the ILO has submitted an important Report providing us with food for thought and an opportunity to put forward our considerations with respect to the future of this Organization.

First of all we must maintain the basic mandate of the ILO. The fundamental objectives behind the creation of the ILO, namely social justice, an improvement of living and working conditions, the fight against poverty, freedom of association and expression are still fully relevant. Today more than ever, the ILO, with its guiding principles, must try to alleviate the social impact of technological change and economic adjustment. The Colombian workers fully support the founding principles of the ILO and its Declaration of Philadelphia, particularly its reference to the fact that "lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice". Colombia is a country which is longing for this peace, not only so that weapons can be laid down, but also for the well-being of its people. Lasting peace is an aspiration of our country, a goal for which 1,500 trade union activists and leaders have been killed in the last seven years; the dream of 16,000,000 Colombians whose homes have no drainage, and 12,000,000 Colombians who have no drinking water; and the hope of 48 per cent of the population who live in extreme poverty.

The ILO cannot accept that the force of the economic model should make it change its values. Our Organization must remain faithful to the victory of social justice over the demands of economic efficiency.

With regard to tripartism, for Colombian workers, the main virtue of the ILO has been to demonstrate to the world the effectiveness of tripartism in its structures, but this, of course, is a distant goal for our country since we do not have tripartite dialogue in areas where economic and social policies are decided.

Economic adjustment policy and its social impact agreements with neighbouring countries, trade relations with financial bodies, and policies aiming at modernizing the State, could have been reached on the basis of a national consensus and stimulating the participation of the social actors if the concept of tripartism had been applied.

Tripartism, in the same way as social consultation, would be, in face, the instruments for lasting peace and a guarantee of democracy in our country.

The trade union movement which is the legitimate representative of the workers cannot be ignored or supplanted as the social element of tripartism.

I would like to refer to the informal sector, employment and critical poverty. Human dignity must be re-established on the basis of job security for men and women. This was the commitment made by member States of the United Nations, to help raise living standards. But the unemployment rate is not waning. On the contrary, the main crisis today is the dearth of jobs. In my country attempts are being made to conceal unemployment within the framework of the informal employment. About 60 per cent of the economically active population is in fact outside the formal economy. This has been the main consequence of structural adjustment programmes. In Colombia more than 300,000 people have lost their jobs in the last three years. And another effect of this policy we are labouring under is precarious employment. Our people, especially young people, are losing any hope of finding a job, and the social situation is very tense because people do not find the job they had hoped for or have to do a menial job. In my country, the construction sector and the armed forces are the main fields generating employment at the moment.

We insist on the fact that employment must be generated through greater economic development and labour flexibility measures. With this objective at the initiative of the Government, in 1990, Act no. 50 was passed, but the offshoot of this is that it did not generate jobs, simply jeopardized job security.

The model being applied means dismantling the manufacturing and productive sector, and encouraging and promoting the most invidious forms of financial speculation regardless of the social cost. There have also been so-called reforms of the social security system which eliminate the humanist principle of solidarity to pave the way for the individual greed of the law of the market.

The free play of market forces has meant less State intervention and the privatization of public service enterprises, including those which were profitable and operational. There has been no announcement by the Government that the jobs lost through modernizing the State would be offset in the private sector, which in fact has not happened. About 50 per cent of Colombians live in a state of absolute poverty, are marginalized and are unable to participate in any way, faced with the Government's inefficiency in solving the problems of unemployment and hidden employment.

The informal sector of the economy has therefore increased at a staggering speed as a result of the economic model which reigns in the world. This phenomenon is not the fault of the trade unions. The trade union movement has had to watch over the protection of the unemployed and organize the self-employed and those working in the informal sector. So, we have the social legitimacy to represent them in the world of work. The creators of unemployment and the informal economy are so misguided that, not only satisfied with social disaster, they are in fact trying to undermine the foundations of the labour movement and replace it with other forms of organization which have nothing to do with the people or social mobilization.

The very same people who are now calling for changes in labour to generate employment, are doing nothing other than destroying what they claim to protect.

Now, I would like to refer to the role of international standards. International labour standards reflect the highest values of the modern world and human rights, despite their technical and specialized nature.

It is often stated, as we hear every year in The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, that there are many countries failing to respect Conventions and limiting the ILO's supervisory capacity. Before suggesting, as some have done, that Conventions and supervisory mechanisms should be limited, we should strengthen them to prevent the outrages observed in many countries.

International trade and competition cannot be based on poor working conditions. ILO standards are minimum common guarantees for all workers.

The calls for flexibility in international labour standards come from the countries that have adopted fewer Conventions than others, this being the most flexible aspect of standards, namely that they are not imposed but adopted on the basis of voluntary mechanisms. But we the workers believe that the claims made with regard to ILO standards amount to the same as our respective countries are doing in terms of the so-called labour flexibility, which is, as in Colombia, in fact reducing levels of protection and job stability under the guise of opening up the market to foreign investment in our country.

We need supervisory mechanisms so that the workers are not left to the mercy of the politicians, and prevent the same sanctions applied against terrorists being turned on trade unionists. There is a contradiction between endorsing the ILO's existence, then, on the one hand, trying to undermine international labour standards which are the very raison d'être of the ILO.

Workers of the world, in our hands and in our actions lies social justice – the humanization of life, namely ins the hope for a dignified future for workers. We have celebrated May day, a time when everywhere people were mobilized to call for better working conditions. Now, in order to protect the working conditions of all workers in the world, ensure respect for fundamental human rights and create productive jobs to combat poverty, we must mobilize the peoples of the world.

Mr. TABANI (Employers' delegate, Pakistan) – The employers of Pakistan join me in extending to the President their heartiest felicitations on his election at this session of the Conference. Allow me to extend my congratulations to the three Vice-Presidents on their election, which reflects the confidence their respective groups have shown in them. Under their able guidance, we look forward to the Conference making a very valuable contribution towards the challenging objectives set forth in the Report of the Director-General.

This Conference has a special significance because the ILO is observing its 75th anniversary. As Members of one of the oldest international organizations, we take pride in the fact that the ILO, over the past 75 years of its existence, has exercised significant influence on labour legislation and socio-economic policies throughout the world, and has had a positive impact on the quality of human lives around us.

I take this opportunity to compliment the Director-General on presenting a Report on the forthcoming challenges of a changing world in the perspective of globalization of the economy, a broader approach to international standards and a restructuring of the ILO to bring the Organization to the service of its constituents. It is comprehensive enough to cover a very wide spectrum of topics, which all need to be thoroughly brought under discussion as we ponder this year on making our role yet more productive and effective. For the sake of brevity I will confine my comments to two important topics which are relevant from the perspective of the socio-economic scenario of the developing world which I represent. These topics relate to the problems of the informal sector and small enterprises, as well as to the future of the ILO.

Recent statistics reveal that, during the last ten years, the number of people living below the poverty line in the developing countries of Asia and Africa has not decreased but has, on the contrary, increased. A recent United Nations report reveals that the richest fifth of the world's population generates and enjoys 85 per cent of world output. The poorest fifth produces, and struggles to survive on, just 1.4 per cent. While this extraordinary maldistribution is difficult to justify, it does show that a great deal can be done for the poorest at a relatively limited cost to the richest. As one of our basic socio-economic strategies to combat poverty, and especially rural poverty and unemployment, we need to look to the informal sector and the establishment of small enterprises as the only possible source of employment for the increasing numbers of the developing world's rapidly growing labour force.

The promotion of small enterprises and entrepreneurship at all levels is dependent on the existence of political stability and natural commitment to a market economy. The development of integrated strategies to implement policies and measures to support a business climate should be with the full cooperation of government, employers and trade organizations.

As we address ourselves to the problems, prospects and needs of the informal sector and small enterprises and their potential role in changing the fate of the economies of the developing countries, we are faced with the dilemma of whether to promote the informal sector as a provider of employment and income; to reduce its capacity to provide jobs by extending to it regulation and social protection; or to reconcile the two objectives and pursue them both simultaneously. Statistics from the developing world show there is a need to undertake a wide range of comprehensive and integrated measures to create a truly effective policy environment conducive to improving the protection of producers and workers in the informal sector and that of small-enterprise development.

Some of the important areas that can be suggested for ILO intervention are: support measures to provide incentives at regional and sectoral levels; technical support to increase the productivity and management skills of existing enterprises; support research, development and dissemination of appropriate technology for small enterprises; assistance in streamlining credit delivery mechanisms; assistance in the establishment of quality control for the products of the small-scale industry sector; support preparation of databanks of feasible project profiles for rural and urban, small and micro-enterprises with a high income elasticity; a review of the effectiveness of existing small industry cooperations to support their expansion in selected areas of market research, product development and diffusion of technology; Asian and African countries, having large rural areas, are characterized by unemployment and poverty. ILO support is needed to improve rural infrastructures and basic education in order to tap the human resources existing in the rural areas, especially in non-agricultural activities.

Let me now turn to the topic concerning the role and credibility of the ILO in the United Nations system and the international arena. While reviewing the impact of the ILO on the teeming millions over the past 75 years of its existence, we recount with pride that, through 174 Conventions and 181 Recommendations it has exercised an overwhelming influence in the social sector. The combined impact of labour standards is that the workers' right to work has been secured and the employers have been obliged to ensure that conditions are promoted to guarantee this right to the workers.

Standing on the threshold of a social revolution beyond their boundaries and economic deprivation within their borders, the developing world celebrates the 75th anniversary of the ILO with a mixed feeling of both hope and suspicion. Confronted with the issues of structural adjustment and the barriers set up by the industrial world, the developing countries are placed in a situation where, to them, economic development has become a paradox, and the very concept of social justice seems decidedly precarious.

The employers and their organizations fear that in an effort to improve the imbalance between the rights of the employers and the workers the ILO has somehow failed to strike a balance between economic growth and social justice, particularly in the wake of the slow pace of socio-economic progress in the developing countries of the world. The failure to create a complementary obligation on the part of the workers to link their performance with the growth of enterprise has led to an imbalance between the workers' right to work and the employers' right to manage, so much so that in recent years employers' organizations have been very vocal in demanding that the international labour standards be reviewed and brought into conformity with the economic needs of the developing world.

The employers' suspicions revolve around questions as to whether the ILO will succeed in adapting international labour standards to the real needs of the developing economies; whether the fundamental charter of human rights in the field of labour created by the ILO strikes a balance between the rights of the workers and of the employers alike, retaining its unique tripartite character, whether the International Labour Organization will provide policy guidelines to all the partners in socio-economic planning with equal weighting.

Our hopes can be realized if the ILO redefines its role and priorities to gear itself to meet the new challenges of a changing social, economic and political environment. While focusing on its founding principles as its mandate, ILO assistance on policy issues and development programmes should be based on the emerging needs and priorities of governments, employers' and workers' organizations in each country. The promotion of basic human rights, democracy and related standards in each country must be recognized in the context of improving access to social services, higher levels of income and increased employment opportunities. Furthermore, the ILO should facilitate the setting up of national commissions at country level to monitor and promote the observance of standards and tripartite relations, employment and human rights development strategies. These commissions should have high-level tripartite participation and policy-making authority and be responsible for advising government at the highest level.

The employers look to the ILO for socio-economic guidelines, which should be targeted on sustainable growth and productive employment creation conducive to reinforcing the policies of privatization, deregulation, industrialization, and helpful in overcoming the socio-economic dimensions of structural adjustment. Such an economic policy must also target or open access to the markets of the industrialized world for exports from developing countries as a positive instrument generating jobs in poor countries, rather than restrict trade by linkages with standards which the ILO needs to resist at all costs. I agree with the Director-General that the ILO should seek cooperation rather than coercion in its efforts to promote social progress, and not rely on a social clause to link international trade with standards. In fact, allowing the World Trade Organization to resort to such an extreme measure would undoubtedly undermine the ILO's standard-setting activity and the subsequent monitoring process by the Committee of Experts.

In conclusion, allow me to welcome the statement of the Director-General that, if the International Labour Organization wishes to continue being the social conscience of the world in the United Nations system, it would be well advised to seek the active collaboration of the many and very different circles that are currently engaged in promoting social justice. To uphold the image of the ILO it is necessary that the precious institution of tripartism is strengthened, because it is through this institution that the success story of the ILO has been written throughout the past 75 years of its existence. This success story will continue as its tripartite partners commit themselves to each other that they will make this Organization more productive and efficient for the service of its constituents. When all is said and done, we must admit that the ILO continues to remain the citadel of the employers' hope for the future.

Mr. HULTIN (Employers' delegate, Finland) – Allow me first of all to join with the previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election. At this stage of the Conference, however, I should rather congratulate him upon so successfully presiding over our deliberations and thus fulfilling the expectations that we have all placed in his hands.

This year the ILO celebrates its 75th anniversary. To mark this milestone, the Director-General has initiated a discussion on the future of the ILO. His Report introduces a number of thought-provoking questions as a basis for this discussion. I welcome this because discussion and the views of the ILO's constituents are the only basis on which to formulate the future of the ILO. The Finnish employers consider the outcome of this debate crucial. For some time now, we have been observing with great concern the erosion of the impact that the ILO has been able to have on social developments in the world.

During 75 years, the ILO has pursued the goal of social justice in the world, a cause which is the cornerstone of its existence. The employers have set out to pursue this very same goal on the basis of free market economy principles. Our view has always been that social development can only be based on economic development. In the past this message has not been well heard. As a consequence, the employers have found themselves isolated and, as the Secretary-General of the International Organization of Employers put it, "treated as an appendix to the institution".

The world has undergone dramatic changes. Market economy is no longer viewed as a threat to workers. The Report recognizes that it has become the universally accepted standard, and that this is the framework within which the ILO must now pursue its cause of social justice. This new approach requires new areas of competence which the employers possess.

To be constructive, the discussion of the ILO's future must be based on a proper understanding of the real nature of the problem. In this regard, I am afraid that the Report sends us off in the wrong direction. It suggests that new technology, in combination with globalization, contributes to widening inequalities among nations. Is this the real problem? Does this mean, as the Report suggests, that we should consider restricting globalization and free trade?

I think not. It is only natural that the change from the past world order to global markets will force structural changes in all of our countries. Although this process of adjustment is unfortunately not easy and requires difficult social challenges to be solved, it does not negate the benefits of globalization, and it is certainly better than the alternative.

Technical development is the means to create prosperity, and free trade is the means to distribute it globally.

Where globalization and liberalization of international trade implies free movement of capital and opening up of markets, the opposite number, protectionism, implies currency controls, restrictions on capital transfers and foreign investment, and protection of own markets. In this perspective, globalization is an integral part of modern day market economy and protectionism creates more inequality among nations. Globalization is therefore something that the ILO must work with and support, not oppose nor restrict.

As I mentioned earlier, there are difficult social challenges associated with globalization and I believe that this is an important area for the ILO's activities. The Director-General puts forward in his Report a number of ideas to attack these difficulties. Some of these ideas are of great concern to me, like social clauses in trade agreements, linking technical cooperation with ILO standards and sharpening the supervisory system for some Conventions.

Social clauses can be applied in cases of unfair trade advantages that are derived from poor working conditions, like alleged low labour costs, and disrespect for workers' and human rights. However, because differences between countries remain wide, a developed country can refer to the social clause at any time, thus excluding the developing country from participating in its markets. Therefore, although the Report discounts the possibility, the social clauses could be and – given the right circumstances – will be used also for protectionist purposes.

Let me now turn to the question of linking ILO standards and technical cooperation. I can see that in some cases there may be some merit to this. However, it needs to be recognized that the engine for social development is productive enterprise activity. Without this, in the long term, there will be no sustainable economic growth, there will be no growth in employment and there will be no wealth creation. The ILO's enterprise activity is in this regard in a unique situation to make a real contribution to social development. The problem is, however, how do you measure the growth of enterprise activity with ILO standards?

This leads me to the question of sharpening the supervisory system for some Conventions. I think that the problem is not how closely or how severely we follow up the application of standards. The question is, rather, how applicable are the standards in the member States? Looking at the ratification behaviour of member States, it is not very encouraging. It is overall very low, and has since 1979 shown signs of even further decline. This is particularly the case among developing countries. I do not, however, believe that this trend can be explained by unwillingness or complacency by these member States. The problem is that many Conventions are tailored for developing countries, who find it increasingly difficult to live up to them themselves. It is only natural that the developing countries find the level of the Conventions too high and the standards too detailed for them to be able to comply.

Over the past years the employers have levied much criticism against the ILO's standard-setting activities. The hope of the employers has been that this part of the ILO's activities would be revised to reflect the reality. An increasing number of Governments are also supporting this view. May I only refer to the vote that was conducted in the Governing Body in March this year on the second standard-setting item for the 83rd Session of the International Labour Conference (1996). Only two Governments opted to have a new standard on the agenda, while others were against.

It is therefore very disappointing for the future of the ILO to see that, instead of truly revising and rationalizing the ILO's standard-setting activities, the Director-General puts the main emphasis on trying to strengthen the existing system through social clauses, technical cooperation and supervisory systems.

(Mr. Mendoza takes the Chair.)

Mr. CHIWESHE (Employers' delegate, Zimbabwe) – Taking the floor for the first time at this Conference, I wish to congratulate the President and his Vice-Presidents on having been elected to officiate over this august assembly. I echo the sentiments that have already been eloquently expressed by the distinguished participants who have spoken before me. I have observed that he has so far discharged the duties which have been entrusted to him by the Conference with the diligence and efficiency for which he is renowned.

The Employers' Confederation of Zimbabwe wishes to join its social partners, that is the Government of Zimbabwe and the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, in congratulating the International Labour Organization on its 75th anniversary. We celebrate this historic occasion at a time when the task of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid has been completed and with the coming into being of a non-racial, democratic South Africa.

The Employers' Confederation humbly requests that it be noted in the ILO's records that the Minister of Labour of the Government of Zimbabwe, who is also the current Chairman of the Governing Body, played a very important and result-oriented role in the Committee on Apartheid.

My confederation, in its own right, co-hosted in Harare in January 1992, a Seminar on the Prospects for the Creation of a Representative Organization of Employers of South Africa. The other co-hosts were the Confederation of Norwegian Business and Industry, the Pan-African Employers' Organization and the International Organization of Employers. My federation salutes the birth of Business South Africa. As in the past, the ILO still has a fundamental role to play. Efforts which were directed to demolishing the foundation and pillars of apartheid should now be redirected to rebuilding the foundation and pillars on which Business South Africa is being build.

We compliment the Director-General for his thought-provoking Report and welcome the tone he has set for its debate. The Report focuses on the future prospects and issues which are certain to preoccupy the minds of policy-makers and policy-implementors in international fora in the years ahead. We remain reminded of the past so that the future can be tackled with the wisdom of hindsight. In all the regions of the world – especially the developing ones – we encounter people' burning desire to engage in activities that promote accelerated economic growth, reduce unemployment and improve the standard of living. The ILO has not been found wanting in giving financial, material and technical assistance where it can.

Global players are multiplying by the day and the parameters within which each one of them must play are becoming less and less definable. We take the case of trade liberalization. It is basically and broadly a welcome step in the right direction for those countries which have embarked on that course. But the failure of the international community to strike an equitable balance between trade liberalization and social justice should obviously have the ILO worried. From its inception in 1919, the ILO has been prominent in playing a facilitative role in promoting social justice all over the world, notably in South Africa and the occupied Arab territories.

What is now frightening is that new mechanisms, which strangle economic growth in developing countries are being contrived. We feel relieved that a lot of our countries have declined to sign or postponed signing Marrakech in its present form. This leads me to say a few words about the social clause.

We appreciate and value the role of the ILO as a standard-setting agency in the United Nations system. Be that as it may, it is our submission that the ILO should take cognizance of the changing demands of the times. When the ILO came into being, unemployment was less of an issue that exploitation of labour. Today, unemployment and exploitation are more or less on an equal level globally. We accept and appreciate that those who introduced the concept of a social clause in GATT had, among other considerations, the interests of the workers at heart. But introducing the social clause into trade by linking it with access to markets and free trade is retrogressive. Rigid labour standards have been known to unduly create difficulties in some developed countries.

We have to conclude that these same countries are now trying to demand unreasonably rigid observance of labour standards in order to stifle developing countries' ability to compete on the international markets, their right to enjoy the benefits of trade and to adequately perform their function of raising the standings of living of their people.

We do not oppose the social clause per se. What we oppose is the rigid manner in which it is intended to be implemented. In capital and technology terms, developing countries are not on a par with the developed countries. Greater play in human resource allocation should be allowed us so that we can utilize that resource to obtain optimum results. The Employers' Federation believes that it would be an act of irresponsibility and dereliction of duty on its part to endorse a proposal which we are convinced will in the long term impact negatively on our economies. Furthermore, we hesitate to subscribe to the concept of a "soft social clause" because in our view it defies definition and will be open to a multiplicity of interpretations.

We entreat the ILO to step up its assistance in the member States, especially in the developing countries to raise the social and economic status of their workers. This can be achieved through education, training and skills upgrading. The end of the Cold War has brought in new hopes and optimism to the world and has freed world leaders from preoccupying themselves with regional political power-balancing gymnastics. The urge to democratize political institutions is running riot in many regions of the world. Changes in Malawi and South Africa, to mention only two countries, readily come to mind. The energy that had in the past been spent on fruitless political infighting is being channelled to rectifying the social and economic ills of the past.

The globalization of the world economy and the introduction of a more liberal trade regime have created favourable conditions for closer economic cooperation between States. Protectionism in any form or guise should be uncompromisingly shunned. In equity and morality countries have the duty to work together in harmony in order to lessen tension in political, social and economic relations. The tripartite nature of the ILO affords it the status which no other international organization enjoys. In that capacity the ILO can play a very important role to help member States promote economic growth and create more employment.

My confederation values very dearly the role of the ILO in providing labour market information and analysis on questions related to employment and work. The continual supply of ILO publications has enabled us to keep abreast of current global development in the world of work. By providing a forum for debate on issues of current concern, such as structural adjustment programmes (SAPs), human resources development, democratization, accountability and transparency, and by providing a point of reference on policy issues and technical problems, for example, in the formulation of labour legislation and national social security schemes, up-to-date labour market information has been made available to social partners.

The ILO has acted as a partner in technical cooperation, for instance, "sponsoring the environment" and "improve your business" programmes. Through the Bureau for Employers' Activities technical assistance was made available to my confederation to organize seminars on international labour standards and our new Labour Act.

We are happy that as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO, it has moved to establishing regional multidisciplinary teams which are composed of ILO staff with knowledge and expertise in the major technical fields covered by the ILO. These include integral members who are specialists in employers' and workers' activities which reflect the ILO's tripartite character.

We in Zimbabwe are particularly fortunate to have the ILO Southern Africa Multidisciplinary Advisory Team (SAMAT) offices in our country because we can easily trap the abundant resources there which include expertise in health and safety, medium and small-scale business development and international labour standards that form the benchmarks that each State is expected to adopt when formulating its own national standards.

To conclude, let me once again re-emphasize the need for industrial peace, productivity and prosperity which can only be achieved through tripartite cooperation and consultation. On behalf of the employers of Zimbabwe, the Employers' Confederation wishes the ILO continued success in its endeavour to promote social justice and greater international solidarity.

Original Portuguese: Mr. TORRES COUTO (Workers' delegate, Portugal) – In conveying this message from the Portuguese workers, I give my warm greetings on this, the 75th anniversary of the ILO. This Organization has played an exceedingly important part in promoting better conditions of work and greater rights for the workers. In addition, I would also like to emphasize the very important part this Organization has played in defending freedom, human rights and peace.

We are living at a time in which, paradoxically, enormous technical progress and advances in democracy are to be found side by side with an increase in unemployment, ever more widespread poverty and marginalization, with all the dramatic consequences and social ills they entail.

Mention is made of this in the excellent Report presented by Mr. Michel Hansenne, the respected Director-General of the ILO, and we congratulate him warmly on the quality of this document.

This Report brings home to us the major problems and challenges confronting us at the end of this century.

The realities are complex; the problems are numerous and diverse; the solutions are not simple, and they cannot be the same for all.

We have regions where unemployment is growing despite economic growth, but there are also parts of the world where the economy is faced with structural difficulties and where millions of men and women are workless and wageless. Stringently monetarist, ultra-liberal macroeconomic policies and self-centred approaches of various kinds are helping to dehumanize work, and intensify harsh competition which respects neither human dignity nor the environment.

Then we have deregulation by which the intention is to give free rein to all market forces, including in the labour market. People are considered no more than commodities – mere objects. The time has come to cast our veto on this backward step. In this context, we welcome as a positive factor the efforts made by the ILO to regulate non-standard labour contracts. In particular, we are pleased to see the effort made in this Conference to ensure balanced regulation of part-time work.

Nothing justifies workers with part-time contracts being treated as second-class workers. They must be assured of the same equality of treatment, access to training, health protection, occupational health and safety and social protection as those enjoyed by full-time workers. I hope this Conference will bring about significant progress in this sensitive area.

I would like to proclaim from this rostrum that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the key ILO Conventions which have enshrined trade union freedoms, the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike are as valid today as ever.

Throughout the world, the civic rights of workers are being violated blatantly or covertly.

In Portugal too, these rights are being violated. The exercise of trade union activities at the workplace is covered by the law but various obstacles are frequently put in the way: trade union delegates and leaders are dismissed or sanctioned, subjected to wage, bonus or career discrimination, and meetings are prevented. Free and unimpeded collective bargaining is being challenged, in particular in the public administration and in public undertakings. Here, for the second year in succession, no agreement was reached because of abusive Government intervention in the imposition of unilateral solutions, with the very grave consequence of reducing workers' purchasing power. The right to strike is subject to gross violations by the abusive imposition of minimum services which do not respect the principles of "necessity", "adequacyäor "proportionality". In practice, maximum services are imposed, and this entirely undermines striking as an effective weapon of pressure. The Portuguese trade unions will be placing before the ILO complaints about these governmental violations of the right to strike, which undermines freedom of association.

Unfortunately, serious though they may be, these are not the only burdens from which Portuguese workers are suffering.

Unemployment is increasing at an ever faster rate. Employment is being made precarious in different ways, and labour and social security regulations are ignored. Wages are falling. New forms of poverty, marginalization and social exclusion are spreading.

Everybody can perceive these problems, but some are trying to play down their extent. But what is more serious is the social insensitivity of those who dogmatically proclaim that it is essential to pare down wages and social costs to guarantee competitiveness. These same voices are demanding a review, or better, a reduction or even a dismantling of social policies. They coldly state that social policies must be economically viable, but systematically avoid reference to guaranteeing the "social acceptability" of economic policies. Today it is crucial to ask whether "law-of-the-jungle" economic policies and commercial practices are socially acceptable.

As a representative of the Portuguese workers, I hereby denounce international trade rules which take account only of goods and ignore people; which forcibly defend property and commercial rights but which overlook the rights of men and women; which deal harshly with economic or fiscal dumping but coldly ignore social dumping.

The ILO has a historic responsibility to help institutionalize the inclusion of social clauses in agreements governing international trade. Future generations will judge us severely if we fail to do so.

Finally, may I offer my greetings to all delegates at this session and, through them, express my solidarity with the poor of the world today. My very special greetings go out to the workers of Timor, the exploited and oppressed victims of the Indonesian regime. I hope that the international community will not continue to overlook the way this people's rights are being violated by the invader.

I hope that the results of the work of this Conference will help to bring us social progress, the settlement of conflicts and peace.

Original Russian: Mr. CHILOV (Workers' adviser, Ukraine) – First of all permit me to congratulate the President on his election to this responsible office and to wish him success in leading the work of the Conference.

This anniversary session which is dedicated to reviewing the role of the International Labour Organization in the modern world and to assessing its ability to respond to the challenges which it will face in the future, is one of those rare moments when the entire community of States is the focus of close attention from the whole world.

For this reason, when considering the ILO's history and the ideals and values it defends, we cannot help but wonder what the true essence of the Organization is? In other words, to what extent is it committed to social justice? Is it ready to continue to promote its development? For if society wishes not only to survive but also to be civilized, it cannot refrain from discussing problems relating to its aims and values.

There is no doubt that while social justice is an objective shared by the entire international community and at the same time, a yardstick which applies to all, it has its particularities in each member country of this community. In this context, we must pay tribute to member States which, at the regional level, have recalled to others that to lose sight of the ideals of social justice entails the threat of losing the fruits of civilization.

In this difficult period, there is no time for overly-cautious compromise or half-baked solutions. There is no time for the satisfaction which comes with reassuring declarations or, worse still, for involvement in lengthy battles of words. We must now develop a strategy which more closely meets the conditions of a world in change. I fully share the opinion of the Director-General that the International Labour Organization has to be able to "adapt rapidly to a changing environment and to respond quickly to new problems".

I think that nobody has any doubt about the opportunities for the ILO to make new efforts aimed at ensuring that the work in the field of labour of employers, workers and governments keeps step with progress in the world.

Firstly, I believe it is necessary not only to maintain but doubtless also to strengthen all of the standard-setting activities of the ILO. On the one hand, we have to constantly review outdated international standards and, on the other hand, we have to introduce new ones which better respond to the needs of tomorrow's world.

At a time when state intervention in the economy is being limited throughout the world, we must not hold back the drafting and adoption of new standards defining market parameters so that the economy is of service to broad egalitarian aims. The Report's explanation of the refusal to ratify a number of standards because of their so-called "maximalist" strategy or "high-value added" provisions is, in my view, nothing more than a consequence of short-sighted economic policy based on austerity. A reduction of the social cost of some standards will inevitably bring pressure to bear for a similar reduction for other standards, and may lead us into a vicious circle where they are all reduced to ever lower levels. There might be other negative consequences as well, leading to "social dismantling".

Responding to the Director-General's request to give some thought to ways we can strengthen the ILO's authority in the protection of the fundamental rights of the working man, I would like to draw your attention to the fact that this can only be possible by strengthening the influence of social interests in the economy or by developing an industrial democracy. The latter is valuable in itself. The people must be able to control the environment in which the larger part of their life takes place. Industrial democracy is also important as a place for the preparation and extension of democracy. Thus, through the international labour Convention advocated in the Report of the Director-General, the ILO could give legitimacy to the practice of joint decision-making by staff and owners of companies and to the involvement of workers in formulating economic policy.

The report by the Council of the Club of Rome, First global revolution, states that in today's world decision-making cannot continue to be the monopoly of governments and their ministries which, moreover, often work as if they were in a vacuum. What this monopoly leads to can be clearly seen in the example of Ukraine. By being extraordinarily self-confident, our home-grown neo-liberals and monetarists have plunged the country into a socio-economic and political crisis. What they call privatization is taking place without the participation of the workers. These supporters of privatization have taken as their slogan: the advice given by Guizot long ago: "Citizens, enrich yourselves". As a result, 73 per cent of the population is living below the poverty line and only 2 per cent are living comfortably.

The policy of "social dualism" is masked by a vast palette of slogans having nothing to do with reality, such as "The liberation of private initiative is the sole source of dynamism" and "Beat back the state dinosaur". As a result we continue to have an unmanageable economy, unique not only for its high level of concentration and monopolism and the specific nature of its structure, but also for its integration in the economies of neighbouring countries.

Neither the planned nor the market economy in its pure form is in a position independently to meet the demands which are being made on our economy. The rational treatment of natural resources, full employment, multiplicity of choice and social stability – these aims can only be achieved by means of a combination of social management and market economics. Decision-makers have to be as close as possible to the people who will either benefit from their decisions or will suffer from them.

I consider that it would be extremely useful if the ILO were to organize and conduct discussions on topical economic problems facing members of the Organization. It should also prepare regular surveys of world economic systems and strategies and of the effects they have on the world of labour. For example, what influence do social security payments have on the functioning of labour markets? What should be the system for financing social insurance programmes with the participation of the State, employers and workers? What is the social cost of the free movement of capital, when hundreds of trade and industrial companies are dismembered and sold off, leading to mass dismissals?

In the context of this last question, we can only agree with the author of the report that there is a sufficient basis for renaming the International Labour Organization the International Employment and Labour Organization. This would make it possible for us to deal with the problem of employment fully and in all its complexity. This has now become one of the most important issues in negotiations between workers and employers. For this reason, obviously, we support the proposal of the Director-General to discuss the problem of employment and the standard of living in the world as a permanent item on the agenda.

The scale and complexity of the new tasks facing the International Labour Organization might make it necessary for us to adopt a number of amendments to the Constitution in order to redefine the respective competences of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body in a more balanced way. I remind you that as early as in 1987, the Report of the Director-General, Reflections on the future of multilateral cooperation: the ILO perspective, stated, "the abolition within the Governing Body of the right to a permanent seat reserved for the ten countries reputed to be the most industrialized in the world was both sensible and just". I think that this statement of the Director-General remains true to the present day.

I hope that the Conference will make recommendations and proposals which will be consistently implemented to enhance the ILO's role as a humanitarian tool to evaluate economic decisions, to develop standard-setting approaches to help find solutions to social problems, and to identify and work to lessen the adverse effects of certain economic mechanisms. In short, that it will help to create a model of an international organization which will be able to look boldly to the future.

Original Portuguese: Mr. DE BARROS (Workers' delegate, Brazil) – It is an honour to participate in this Conference on behalf of the Brazilian Workers' delegation on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO. It is a doubly gratifying experience since in addition to celebrating the Organization's anniversary, we are present for the reintegration of South Africa into the ILO in consequence of the victory of its people in the struggle against apartheid. We pay tribute to their steadfastness.

This assembly is being held at a time in which social problems have reached a state of unparalleled gravity worldwide. We are living in a society that has achieved unprecedented technical development, in a world in which the economy is being globalized and frontiers are disappearing. But these developments are accompanied by job losses and increasing unemployment, with grave consequences for the Third World. In the Third World, enterprises are being replaced by the informal sector, in which conditions are unstable and bereft of prospects. At the same time, we are witnessing a growth in absolute poverty so grave as to destroy entire nations, threatening political stability and leading to the exploitation of child labour. One day, the impact of these trends will be felt in the developed world as well.

We hope that, as affirmed by the Director-General, the ILO will not lose sight of its mandate.

The Director-General's Report makes no specific proposals; it only suggests possible lines of action. However, we note that the closing lines of the Introduction contain an appeal to member countries to take action to promote social justice and tripartism. We attach great importance to this appeal since the Government of Brazil, through its Minister of Labour, has already stated its position on the subject at this Conference. In his speech, he said that the "ILO must play an important role during the World Summit for Social Development. It should thereby strengthen its role as promoter of workers' rights and the fundamental freedoms of the world of labour. The ILO must develop conditions to promote strong international cooperation between member States to assist those in greater difficulties to implement better working conditions".

Although the Director-General makes a number of constructive points in his Report, we note with concern his inclination to propose that Conventions should be replaced by so-called "soft" legislation. We wish to point out that the ILO already has machinery under article 19 of its Constitution for adopting non-binding instruments. As we see it, the "soft" legislation being proposed would operate to the detriment of standards designed to benefit workers. In this regard, the Workers' group has already let it be known that it is willing to discuss the content of standards and could even agree to the original proposal which would allow studies to be undertaken under article 19, through the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, as a sufficient instrument for the evaluation of standards.

Another concern of the workers is unemployment. Although the Director-General refers in strong language to the world crisis in employment, the problem of the quality of employment and the quantity of jobs is of great concern to us despite his specific proposal that the ILO should take action internationally to promote employment through the publication of reports, the promotion of periodical high-level meetings of the Governing Body and inclusion of a permanent item dealing with the subject on the agenda of the Conference.

The Report refers to a certain incompatibility between job creation and labour legislation. It is inconceivable that we should think in terms of an "incidental conflict" between labour legislation and employment opportunities. There is also a reference to structural adjustment programmes and the failure to take account of their social impact. It is acknowledged that the ILO has no influence on the decisions of the International Monetary Fund or the World Bank in the sense of proposing policies designed to deal with the unfortunate circumstances that make such adjustment necessary.

We believe that an excellent opportunity has presented itself with the establishment of the World Trade Organization, in the context of which we propose that the ILO should move to have a social clause included among the standards governing world trade because we believe that world trade cannot be divorced from workers' interests. We feel that the way to avoid the proliferation of unacceptable labour practices that affect the competitiveness of international trade and to reduce the protectionist pressures that these practices entail is for the ILO to organize an international discussion on the social clause. The Director-General is to be commended for mentioning the need for ministers of labour, employment and social affairs to put greater pressure on governments and for the ILO to respond more rapidly and effectively with counselling on the subject of labour legislation.

In conclusion, we are certain that the salutary practice of tripartism will enable the ILO, by the end of this century, to devise ways and means of ensuring that poverty shall not be a legacy of the twentieth century to the twenty-first.

I take this opportunity to say how satisfied we are that a Workers' delegate has been elected to direct the proceedings of this historic Conference.

Mr. DOBRIN (Employers' delegate, Romania) – It is a pleasure for me as a representative of the employers of Romania to address sincere congratulations to the President on his election at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

This year, the Conference is taking place within the context of two major anniversaries, so that we have the pleasure of celebrating the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The Report of the Director-General significantly emphasizes the triumph of the market economy concept and practices in Eastern Europe. Romania, as a European country and an ILO member since the very beginning, has reaffirmed its commitment to the values of democracy, consequently promoting the necessary laws in accordance with international standards.

It is a great responsibility for me to report to the Conference that the word "employer", the concept and the employer spirit, are now rooted in Romanian social life.

The employers' organizations have already been consulted with regard to different laws that affect social life. The employers have also formulated constructive amendments with a view to enhancing the promotion of the free market economy concept and provisions of the ILO standards.

Trade union law and the law concerning collective agreements are now in the process of being updated. The role and activities of the employers' associations will be defined and set forth within the framework of a new law. I would also like to add that, by the end of the year 1994, some 3,000 small and medium-sized state-owned companies will be privatized, and the employers will have to develop adequate and concrete approaches in accordance with the reality of the economy, so that they will be able to cope with the social and economic difficulties.

From an analysis of the Director-General's Report, we have identified ourselves with the concerns of the ILO in the fields of industrial relations, labour law and labour relations. The Romanian employers have been in a position to get the benefit of the ILO's solutions and comparative information with regard to tripartism and collective bargaining issues. Advice has been provided to Romania in the field of remuneration with a view to designing the reform in the context of structural adjustment and the transition to the market economy.

Consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers on specific social issues has now become general practice in Romania. Chapter 2 of the Report of the Director-General with regard to the ILO's activities is a very sensitive one. Structural adjustment policies, especially those which form part of the conditions for the use of International Monetary Fund resources and World Bank credits, are of the utmost importance for the activities which are to be developed by Romanian employers.

We understand our role as employers and we act in order to embark on socially oriented approaches. Since the social employment measures are not always in harmony with the aims of the adjustment programmes – as the Report emphasizes – we have to strengthen relations between the social partners and promote tripartism, not only as a concept, but also in practice.

Our final aim is to represent and defend the common interests of the employers, and we truly believe that by taking part actively in the process of cooperation on the basis of ILO standards and developing the tripartite social dialogue, we will better contribute to the development of the employer image not only in Romania, but in Europe.

I would like to highlight the willingness of the Romanian employers to take part in regional activities embarked on by the ILO or by ILO multidisciplinary teams, in order to be familiar with the ILO spirit and to contribute to the building of an active European partnership policy.

I would also like to convey the idea that these employer activities could be very well undertaken by a new European ILO multidisciplinary team based within the Carpathian, Black Sea and Balkan region.

We strongly appreciate the activities undertaken by the ILO in the field of the working environment and ergonomics, the provision of practical guidance to reduce the incidence of occupational injuries and accidents, the activities to strengthen national capacity to identify and control the most widespread sources of exposure to occupational diseases, and the dissemination of occupational safety and health data through publications and seminars.

I would like to thank the ILO and the ILO Training Centre in Turin for allowing our employer representatives to acquire new theoretical knowledge and skills with regard to the development of small and medium-sized enterprises and to occupational safety and health issues.

The Romanian employers strongly support the ILO activities and the Report of the Director-General.

I wish the best to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. AASER (Employers' adviser, Norway) – My congratulations to the ILO on its 75th anniversary!

It is an honour and a pleasure for me to have this opportunity to comment, on behalf of Norwegian employers, on the Director-General's Report.

I would like to extend my congratulations to the President on his election to the presidency of this session of the Conference, a session which will certainly be well remembered. The reason is that the theme of the Director-General's Report this year is an in-depth discussion of the future of the ILO. I shall comment upon a few points which I believe are crucial.

As an introduction, I would like to comment on a general opinion regarding the ILO which has come to my knowledge lately: the ILO will have to refocus its activities because there is a danger that it will develop into an international organization of marginal interest and relevance to a substantial number of member States. It would in future have to compete with the activities of the World Bank and others in developing countries, countries which might prefer to turn to the World Bank for assistance. It would thus be the obvious thing for the ILO now to try to analyse where it has its strong points and how to cultivate and strengthen its core mandate.

Accordingly, my organization, the Confederation of Norwegian Business and Industry (NHO) feels that the ILO is now at a crossroads. From time to time, organizations, institutions and persons have to choose one from the variety of possible directions in their work. But to be able to do so, it is crucial to have clearly defined objectives and results, because it is only through those that one is able to assign priorities to the means one has at hand.

In our opinion, the ILO has considerable means at hand.

First and foremost, the unique structure of the Organization. The ILO is the only body within the United Nations system which works and makes decisions after consulting with and listening to employers' and workers' groups. The tripartism in the ILO is now challenged. Delegations must be composed of genuine delegates from the most representative organizations of workers and employers and ministries of labour in the ILO member countries. I am saying this because the Report suggests that tripartism should acquire a new dimension and be strengthened by the inclusion of other interest groups – other actors of economic life. It is our conviction that if that happens, the prestige and power of the two non-governmental groups – employers and workers – will be diluted, reducing the significance of the ILO. Furthermore, ILO Conventions – standards – are another means, but only one among others available to the Organization to achieve the objectives it set for itself in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Allow me to share with you the view of NHO and Norwegian business on the ILO's standard-setting activity.

It is a fact that can easily be supported by statistical figures that during the last decade or more, fewer and fewer ratifications of Conventions have been registered. From 1975 to 1990, 31 Conventions were adopted by the various sessions of the International Labour Conference. Only five, I repeat, only five of them are ratified by 30 countries. In this period, the ILO had approximately 150 member States. It is obvious that this is not a satisfactory result, particularly when one takes into account the heavy, costly and long-lasting work behind each of the Conventions, not to forget the numerous delegates involved.

The reason for non-ratification of the Conventions is very often that the text is too detailed, not relevant for practical use and full of technical items which are not in harmony with national law and practice, and which would be too costly for the member countries to adjust to. Since the "customers are not buying the goods any more", it is obvious that something is wrong.

I myself am a business leader of a pharmaceutical company in Norway in addition to being the elected President of the Confederation of Norwegian Business and Industry. To be frank, I can hardly point out any good reason for my company to take part in the creation of Conventions, because I cannot find any advantage to my company in them. On the contrary, some of the Conventions are even stumbling blocks to the smooth running of my day-to-day business. Unfortunately for the ILO, my company is not an exception. Against this background, we carefully read the part of the Report on "Adapting standards to real needs". It shows that the Director-General looks upon standards and standard-setting activity with a critical eye, sharing the concerns of the Employers' group on this matter. We are therefore optimistic and look forward to practical change in the process of producing new Conventions.

It is the employers' opinion that the time has come when the ILO must reconsider its procedure for choosing areas for possible new standards. The Organization should devote resources to the examination of the existing Conventions and update them so that they meet the practical needs in business life towards the turn of the century. If and when new standards are produced, they must be flexible and aim at the creation of productive employment.

Another means for the ILO to reach its objectives and to become an organization of importance as regards sustainable employment policies in a changing world is to make full use of the competence and regional experience of the Organization.

ILO technical cooperation is well known to my country, because Norway is the second largest donor to the ILO technical cooperation budget. To assist developing countries in strengthening democratic and non-governmental institutions, such as employers' and workers' organizations, should be at the forefront of the ILO's activities throughout the world. The ILO, with its tripartite structure, has a unique standing and position in this context, which should be used in the efforts of bringing developing countries and countries with outdated, centralized-economy systems up to a higher socio-economic level. Only sustainable economic activity can produce jobs, income and improved living and working conditions. The newly established regional tripartite teams are qualified to play a significant role. The member States of the ILO, in all regions, must express their national financial institutions without any social dimension.

Austerity programmes and policies have led to poverty, to a rise in illiteracy and increasing precariousness of health and employment.

As our countries have been channelling their resources to their heavy debts and to servicing these debts, the poverty of African peoples has been increasing at a staggering pace.

The failure of these disastrous policies has led the heads of African governments of the CFA zone to accept a 50 per cent devaluation of the CFA franc.

In a resolution adopted at Dakar, the Heads of State of the countries of the CFA zone noted the poor results of more than a decade of structural adjustment, despite the sacrifices borne by their peoples.

This measure, described as historic, marks the continuation of the workers' struggle to repair the serious damage to their purchasing power.

In Senegal, following this devaluation, negotiations were launched between unions, the Government and the employers to increase wages, first of all in the public service, and then in the private sector. Family allowances and retirement pensions were increased and a national sickness insurance fund set up.

A tripartite committee was also set up to manage the post-devaluation period.

In some African States that are members of the CFA zone, workers have gone on prolonged strikes in order to obtain a substantial wage increase to offset this new parity of the CFA franc.

This is an appropriate occasion to denounce the flagrant violation by a number of governments of the fundamental Conventions which guarantee freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining. Workers have been penalized, dismissed for strike action, or simply stripped of their union office.

The dawn of the third millenium provides an appropriate opportunity to finally break with the past and its legacy and to pave the way for sustained economic development which will really contribute to the well-being of the peoples of our continent. African economic integration has become self-evident today. This is one of lessons of devaluation, as is the inevitable effect of currency on the economy of nations. African workers in the CFA zone therefore see monetary independence as a prerequisite for political independence.

However, it is undeniable that only fair competition can offer equal opportunities for all countries and thus guarantee social justice.

Unfortunately, as the Director-General has said in his Report, failure by any nation to adopt truly humane working conditions hampers the efforts of other nations wishing to improve the lot of the workers in their own countries.

Indeed, countries with backward labour legislation are blatantly violating international Conventions to achieve an economic growth which is beyond the reach of those countries trying to achieve lasting social progress.

Therefore, we would like to take this opportunity to urge greater vigilance in standard-setting and, with this in mind, we support the social clause, whose only objective is to guarantee adequate working conditions by the application of the labour standards universally recognized within the ILO.

We would of course warn those who would use this as an opportunity to give the standards a retrograde protectionist content. We, with the ILO, will remain particularly watchful.

Mr. SMITH (Workers' adviser, Antigua and Barbuda) – I wish to congratulate Mr. Charles Gray for having been unanimously elected President to preside over this historic session of the International Labour Conference. I am greatly impressed with the way the President and his Officers have handled the proceedings of this Conference so far.

It is also a great pleasure for me to be able to participate in this important Conference. Indeed, this assembly is not only historic because it is the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, neither is it so because of the re-entry of South Africa under a freely elected Government.

This occasion will be indelibly engraved on my mind because it is the first time that I have had the pleasure of attending the meetings of this august body, and further to be given the opportunity to address this historic Conference.

I can only hope that the inclusion of the Antigua Workers' Union in this Conference in 1994 genuinely brings to an end the years of discrimination and victimization against our Organization by the V.C. Bird Government. The main reason for our exclusion from this Conference over the years has been our non-support of the policies of the Government. I sincerely hope that from now on all sides in Antigua and Barbuda will be recognized for their worth and not for the support of those who occupy the seat of power.

The ILO took a very important decision to establish a Caribbean office 15 years ago. Before then few people in Antigua and Barbuda, and perhaps the general Caribbean population, knew what the ILO was all about. It has made a significant contribution to our people in the field of workers' education and other activities. We hope that this Office will remain with us for a long, long time to come.

We are meeting at a time when the workers of the world are facing the worst economic crisis since the 1930s. Approximately one-third of the world's working population is either unemployed or underemployed.

This Conference was informed on 8 June by a representative of the World Bank, Mrs. Amoako, that over a billion people continue to live in absolute poverty, struggling to survive on a dollar a day. This is indeed a frightening situation. But what makes it more disturbing and agonizing to me – and I venture to say all working people – is that the representative of the World Bank also reported that the Bank's estimates suggest that if economic growth is low and recent trends in the growth of poverty continue, then there could be 200 million more poor people in the developing world by the end of the century.

The distinguished World Bank's representative then told this Conference that poverty remains our fundamental challenge. It is common knowledge that the policies of the World Bank and IMF have marginalized workers and working class organizations, and are one of the main reasons for the present appalling state of affairs in the world today.

The International Labour Organization, in my view, must take due note of the findings of the World Bank and call upon it to make positive efforts to assist in reducing the global poverty that threatens the well-being of mankind. If it does so the world's financial institutions would be underpinning the endeared principle of the ILO that universal and lasting peace can only be achieved if it is based upon social justice, respect for human rights, humane working conditions, employment opportunities and economic security for all.

The Director-General of the ILO in his Report to this Conference stated that the ILO "has 169 member States and covers some 98 per cent of the population of the world". An Organization as universal as the ILO should be able to face these challenges and provide some measure of hope for the future.

It is no secret that the trade union movement led the struggle for the world's wealth to be shared equitably among our peoples. We in the Caribbean are very much aware of the necessity of having vibrant unions. The labour movement has been under a most vicious and sustained attack. In some quarters the powers that have succeeded in weakening the movement, forcing workers to give up hard-won gains.

At this Conference there has been a long and meticulous discussion on part-time work. Some employers and governments would like this Conference to provide them with a license on how to use "part-time workers" to undermine working standards that have been established through years of struggle. A worker is a worker and should be entitled to all the benefits in the plant on a pro rata basis. We in the Antigua Workers' Union do not accept that there is such a thing as part-time workers. We think there are of course part-time jobs that do not require the maximum hours of work which a normal full-time job requires.

A careful observation of the workings of the Committees gives me the impression that there is a growing collaboration between the employers and some anti-working class governments to defeat just and fair recommendations that will favour working class people. I hope that the tripartite system which forms the backbone of the International Labour Organization will not be used to slow down the progress of working people or reduce already established standards.

We would like to join with the many people who have congratulated South Africa, but we wish to warn that the system of apartheid that was so deeply entrenched for so many years cannot be uprooted merely by having an all-race election. The people of South Africa still need the vigilant support of this body to ensure that the total system of apartheid is cleared from the soil of South Africa. Only then will it be a lasting "Free at last!" as proclaimed by its President Nelson Mandela and others.

We in Antigua and Barbuda are concerned with the conflict in Haiti, a Caribbean country as well, and with those in other parts of the world. We would like to urge the various international organizations to intensify their efforts to bring about peace among the warring factions.

Finally, I hope that this century will not close before the member States ratify and effectively implement the ILO Conventions and/or Recommendations that are presently hidden on paper of the files of these countries. This will undoubtedly make the International Labour Organization grow stronger as it grows older in the new century.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – I now give the floor to Mr. Tirumurti, Government adviser, India, who wishes to exercise his right of reply to the statement made on 16 June by Mr. Hameed, Government delegate, Pakistan.

Mr. TIRUMURTI (Government adviser, India) – My delegation takes the floor to set the records straight with regard to the baseless charges made against my country by the delegate of Pakistan. Jammu and Kashmir form an integral part of India and the reference made by him to it is a blatant and unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of my country. The present disturbed conditions in Kashmir are entirely the creation of Pakistan through its instigation and support of religious-based terrorism in pursuit of its sole objective of territorial expansion. It is well documented that terrorists, armed, trained and sustained by Pakistan, have been unleashed against innocent civilians in Jammu and Kashmir. This gives the lie to Pakistan's feigned concern for the conditions of workers in Jammu and Kashmir. Indeed by selectively targeting politicians, human rights activists, academics, media persons, etc., Pakistan has sought to destroy the very foundation of the democratic system in the Indian states of Jammu and Kashmir.

We reject any call for a fact-finding mission or international supervision, as the fact of Pakistan's involvement in terrorism is well documented and as Jammu and Kashmir are open, in keeping with India's policy of transparency. Several thousand persons visit Jammu and Kashmir annually, including foreigners, journalists, NGOs, etc. Pakistan's concerns about the economic conditions of workers in Jammu and Kashmir ring hollow in the face of enormous resources spent by India on development efforts in Jammu and Kashmir and Pakistan's stepmotherly treatment of the area of Jammu and Kashmir under its illegal occupation. This is borne out by the fact that while in the Indian states of Jammu and Kashmir, the economy has been industrialized and diversified with the share of the primary sector declining from 68 per cent in 1960 to 39 per cent in 1987, and that of the secondary sector increasing from 9 per cent to 23 per cent, the economy of Pakistan-occupied Kashmir remains stagnant and oriented towards primary production. We therefore reject any suggestion to include the subject in the future agenda of the Conference.

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – I now give the floor to Ms. Mukadi, Workers' delegate, Indonesia, who wishes to exercise her right of reply to the statement made on 8 June by Mr. Kearney, International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation.

Ms. MUKADI (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) – I have asked for the floor to exercise the right of reply to the statement by Mr. Kearney, representative of the International Textile, Garment and Leather Workers' Federation, made in the plenary sitting on Wednesday, 8 June 1994.

Speaking on behalf of the All Indonesia Workers' Union (SBSI), I should like to strongly reject the allegations contained in his statement as groundless. Much to our dismay Mr. Kearney has deliberately abused the integrity of this august forum by resorting to pressure-type criticisms which are unsubstantiated and based on distorted and biased news on the so-called "Titi Sugiarti case" from a self-interest objective.

Titi Sugiarti was 23 years old and unmarried. The mortal remains of Titi Sugiarti were found one morning last April in the waste disposal place not far from the site of petecahatex, a textile factory in Sumadao, West Java, where she worked. Thus it is very wrong for Mr. Kearney to say that Titi Sugiarti worked at the shoe company. The fact that he was careless of such a small detail only invites us to question the objectivity of his statement.

Let me thus provide you with some hard facts on the case concerned contrary to all that Mr. Kearney claimed. Titi Sugiarti was, indeed, a member of the SBSI, at no time did a strike case take place at the factory where she worked, nor a single worker dismissal or even introduced by the management of the company. But some irresponsible quarters must take advantage of the existing unclear situation of Titi Sugiarti's death. The case is now under proper and intensive investigation by the competent authorities. It is misleading for anyone to pass judgement or to draw conclusions from that inconclusive investigation. Nevertheless, on account of reliable sources there are three possible causes of Titi Sugiarti's death: fatal accident, murder or suicide. SBSI has a moral obligation to help with the funeral in her home town in central Java and giving Titi's family some assistance. SBSI asked the competent authorities to make a proper and intensive investigation into Titi Sugiarti's death.

President: Mr. Matinchev

REPORT OF THE STANDING ORDERS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – The first item on our agenda this afternoon is the report of the Standing Orders Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Rhenan Segura, Government delegate, Costa Rica, Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee, to present the Committee's report, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 11.

Original Spanish: Mr. RHENAN SEGURA (Government delegate, Costa Rica; Chairman and Reporter of the Standing Orders Committee) – I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Orders Committee which met on 9 June 1994, to discuss and approve two proposed amendments of Articles 38 and 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

These proposals are, consequently, part of the reforms carried out by the Governing Body to streamline its work with a view to facilitating the various preparatory stages of the procedure for drafting standards.

One of these reforms dealt with the point at which the Governing Body decided to set the agenda of the Conference. Previously this decision was taken in November, that is 18 months before the session of the Conference at which the item was to be discussed, which left relatively little time for the various preparatory stages leading up to the drafting of standards.

Under the new schedule, the Governing Body will now determine the items to be placed on the Conference agenda at its March meetings, that is to say 26 months before the session of the Conference at which the items are to be considered. This means that for a question governed by the double-discussion procedure an additional eight months will be available between the time the Governing Body fixes the agenda of the Conference and the date on which the Conference begins consideration of the item.

This additional period will mean that the Office will have more time to prepare the questionnaire and Governments will have three additional months to reply to them. Finally, it will also give the Office more time to analyse the replies for use in drawing up a report, which will serve as a basis for the first discussion of a double-discussion item at the Conference.

In the case of an item governed by the single-discussion procedure, there will be an additional six months to be divided equally between the Governments and the Office in the various stages of the standard-setting preparatory work.

The proposed amendments to the Standing Orders of the Conference reflect this new schedule which has been agreed upon by the Governing Body within the framework of the preparation of standards. These changes represent an important step forward in attempts to improve the quality of the reports prepared by the Office prior to the initial discussion of an item at the Conference.

In conclusion, it is my duty and pleasure to submit on behalf of myself and of the two Vice-Chairmen of the Standing Orders Committee our report which was adopted unanimously and which we recommend for your adoption together with the proposed amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan; Vice-Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee) – You have just listened to the report submitted by Mr. Rhenan Segura of Costa Rica pertaining to the report on the amendments to articles 38 and 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. These recommendations were outlined by the Governing Body at its 256th and 258th Sessions. They were unanimously recommended to the Conference to amend of the Standing Orders, thus enabling the Governing Body to select the items on the agenda 26 months instead of 18 months before the session in question is held. This also will allow governments more time to send their replies to the questionnaire sent by the Office along with those of the representative workers' and employers' organizations.

I must thank Mr. Rhenan Segura who chaired our meetings, and also Ms. Hak, the spokesperson of the Employers' group, and Mr. Martin, the representative of the Director-General, who assisted us ably. I am also thankful to the members of the Committee who unanimously decided to endorse the recommendations put forward by the Governing Body, and particularly the Workers' group, which requested that I be their spokesperson.

I must say that these reforms are meant to expedite the work of the Conference efficiently and expeditiously. The number of days of this session of the Conference has been reduced in relation to past years. We have been working even on Saturdays in violation of ILO standards so that all of us can go back home early and so we can finalize the items on our agenda as quickly as possible.

With this observation, I ask you to adopt these recommendations which are meant to reform the functioning of the Conference.

Ms. HAK (Employers' delegate, Netherlands; Vice-Chairman of the Standing Orders Committee) – The Employers' group of the Standing Orders Committee recommends to you the adoption of paragraph 8 of the report that you have before you. As it was already explained by the Chairman of the Committee, the changes were prepared in order to have longer preparatory stages for the reports submitted to the Conference. The proposals give more time both to the Office and to governments, and we hope that the result will be that the Conference gets better reports. It took very little time to adopt the proposals because there was consensus.

I recommend that you adopt the changes and I would like to thank the Office for all the work, because it looks very simple but there is always a lot of work behind it.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – There being no further requests for the floor, we shall move on to the adoption of the report which entails the adoption of paragraphs 1 to 7 as well as the amendments to the Standing Orders proposed in paragraph 8 of the report. May I take it that paragraphs 1 to 7 are adopted?

(Paragraphs 1 to 7 are adopted.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – May I also take it that the amendments to articles 38 and 39 of the Standing Orders proposed in paragraph 8 of the report are adopted?

(The report and amendments are adopted.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the members of the Committee for the excellent work they have done.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – We now continue with the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDUL HUSSAIN ABDULLA (Workers' delegate, Bahrain) – In the name of God, most merciful and compassionate! It is a great honour for me to address this important assembly on behalf of the workers of Bahrain. I have pleasure in extending warm congratulations to the President on his election to the chair of this Conference. We wish him every success in his work.

We are very happy to welcome the new Members who have joined the ILO. We are also proud that our Conference is being chaired by an outstanding and capable Workers' delegate, whose wide experience and wisdom will ensure, God willing, that the proceedings of this historic Conference are crowned with success.

I should also like to take this opportunity to commend Mr Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, on his fine work and on his felicitous choice of subject for his Report to the Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change, an important topic and a timely one since it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the founding of our venerable Organization and the 50th anniversary of the famous Declaration of Philadelphia. The Report reflects the spirit and principles that led to the establishment of the Organization based on a unique tripartite structure and the sound counsel it has consistently followed with a view to achieving social justice, security and world peace.

Basing ourselves on the principles and goals of the ILO, which are the promotion of social justice and peace through the protection of workers, defence of their rights and improvement of their working conditions, we should like to stress the importance of the following points.

Firstly, social partnership must be strengthened and tripartite consultations supported in order to achieve a joint vision of social justice.

Secondly, as an integral component of the international community, we pin great hopes on the World Summit for Social Development to be held next year. We wish the ILO success in exerting its influence within the United Nations system to reassert the principle of tripartite consultation through full tripartite participation in the proceedings of the Summit.

Thirdly, the standards established by the ILO are the pillars of this Organization and an important standard of reference for the enforcement of rights. Any attempt to undermine them will prevent the social partners from fulfilling their role and their duties to humanity. The idea of soft legislation proposed by the Director-General in his Report is therefore of no avail. Instead we must create new working methods and more effective machinery to implement international standards.

Fourthly, we support the Director-General's proposals relating to ways of enabling the Organization to intensify its action to deal with the world unemployment crisis, provided that basic protection for workers is strengthened and efforts to reduce poverty and unemployment in different parts of the world are redoubled.

Fifthly, in the light of the continuous economic and social changes occurring at all levels, it has become essential for the ILO to establish labour standards and monitor their implementation in order to protect basic workers' rights. This can only be done in coordination with the World Trade Organization.

The efforts of our young Organization will be short-lived without your support and your backing through the Governing Body of the ILO for the labour and educational activities that we wish to promote within the limits of our modest resources.

Your support has certainly become more necessary than ever if we wish to keep abreast of social and economic developments while maintaining international labour standards and their content and purport.

May the peace, mercy and grace of God be with you.

Mr. BASNET (Workers' delegate, Nepal) – At the outset, allow me, on behalf of the workers of Nepal, to express our heartfelt congratulations to the President on his unanimous election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. Furthermore, he is chairing the Conference on a very important occasion, as we are observing the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, which provides an opportunity to look back at the past and forward to the future, for the better protection of workers' rights on the eve of the twenty-first century.

The world is undergoing new changes and taking new approaches to social protection. The emphasis on technological progress has led to new forms of social vulnerability which are a further cause for concern. The ILO should adapt to rapidly changing conditions in order to better achieve its noble goals. Tripartism is the ILO's unique strength. There is a need to find new ways of applying standards more effectively. The setting of new standards must continue. Employment policy and strategies must take basic rights of workers into account and pay full attention to the safety, security and the standard of living of workers.

The President rightly mentioned in his address that the labour of human beings should not be treated as merchandise or an article of commerce. Every worker has the right to a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Minimum wages of workers should correspond to the needs of their life.

Tripartism and collective bargaining are under way in Nepal now that the democratic political system has been restored. This process will enhance workers' bargaining capacity for the protection and promotion of their rights, for better working and justifiable living conditions. Timely reforms and the amendment of laws and regulations are also necessary to better serve the workers' interests. Effective implementation of legislation is the most important part of the system for the protection of workers. We have to develop institutions to protect workers, including the establishment of a labour court. Workers' welfare should be promoted. Employment generation should also ensure workers' protection if social justice is to be achieved.

We welcome the ILO office in Katmandu and thank the ILO for opening it.

We believe that this 75th anniversary session of the Conference will effectively promote social justice and peace by protecting the rights of workers and by promoting their working conditions.

Mr. DATO' MOKHZANI (Employers' delegate, Malaysia) – Let me begin by offering the President the highest congratulations of the Employers' delegation from Malaysia. We would also like to congratulate the two Vice-Presidents on their election. We also extend our greetings to all delegates.

We meet this year on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organization. The ILO has accumulated enough experience so that a reassessment of its work should be made in preparation for the challenges of the twenty-first century. In this regard my delegation welcomes the Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change. It is a document which provides a framework for us to debate and decide on the path which the ILO must take as it marches towards its hundredth anniversary.

Several parts of the Report are of interest to my country and we believe it is also of interest to other developing countries. My delegation would like to register our disagreement with certain quarters in this august body which are advocating an international minimum wage standard. We urge the ILO and its members to refrain from holding up this banner. In our view the implementation of a global minimum wage will erode and even eliminate the competitive edge of developing countries. Such a move will increase the cost of labour in these countries, which even in the medium term cannot be compensated by improved technology. As such, wages should be related to the cost of living, and there is no denying that the cost of living in developing countries is generally lower than that in the industrialized countries. Malaysian employers are opposed to any move to introduce a minimum wage on a world scale.

Nowadays there is much talk of globalization of the economy. Few, however, make the concept clear enough by indicating what globalization implies. Indeed, the world has become more interdependent than ever before. However, let it be said once again that international trade is still based on the age-old notion of comparative advantage. Relatively lower wage costs, accompanied by relatively lower costs of living in developing countries, are very much the cost advantage these countries possess vis-à-vis industrialized countries. This should not be "globalized" on the pretext of providing a better deal for workers in the developing countries.

There are also parties promoting the "social clause", arguing that access to markets in the industrialized countries should be conditional upon meeting labour standards as defined by these countries. Thus, trade barriers will be imposed unless certain acceptable labour and social protection standards, as externally defined, are adhered to. This could be yet another form of non-tariff barrier.

It is a source of some relief that the Director-General's Report stated that "the ILO should recognize that its mandate requires both that it be a party to this debate, and yet that it should not advocate either restrictions to trade or compulsory equalization of social costs". However, the following pages of the Report speak of the necessity of adopting certain measures, such as the imposition of certain minimum standards, before a country's product is to be accepted in the international market.

Our delegation would like to state categorically that it is opposed to the imposition of social clauses because, like the international minimum wage, it smacks of protectionism. Such measures are but another feature of discriminatory practice, the end-effect of which will be detrimental to developing countries struggling for a higher share of the world market in order to create a surplus to be used for raising their standard of living.

Another point of contention is whether the existence of a high level of wages or excellent conditions of work is the result of the so-called "social clause". From practical observation and experience in newly emerging economies, it is obvious that it is only in the well managed countries and in thriving enterprises that workers continue to prosper, and the prosperity itself induces them to bargain for – and get – the benefits of development including higher wages, better conditions of work and greater personal and political freedom.

I would like now to refer to ILO Conventions. The total number of Conventions now stands at 174. However, the record of ratification of Conventions by member States, including industrialized countries which so readily criticize the developing countries, has been dismal and there is no sign that this situation will change in the near future. The first part of the Director-General's Report states that the rate of ratification of Conventions has been stagnating for a good number of years. In our view, it is not enough for the ILO merely to produce Conventions. A quick glance at the Conventions which have been adopted by the Conference over the years shows that the circumstances and conditions which influenced the adoption of these Conventions at the time have now substantially changed. In the face of the changes which have occurred, it is incumbent on the ILO to re-evaluate the relevance of existing Conventions, their effectiveness and their suitability in today's world. We support the proposal in the Director-General's Report that the ILO should review Conventions which, in spite of their relevance, have not been ratified because their provisions are considered too rigid. We agree with the Director-General's statement that a Convention should aim at defining a general framework, leaving the more detailed provisions to a Recommendation.

Based on the poor state of ratification of existing Conventions, we would urge the Conference to refrain from considering adopting more Conventions. The resources available to the ILO should be better utilized to promote wider ratification of existing Conventions and to strengthen technical assistance to member States.

On the subject of technical assistance, we are concerned to learn from the Director-General's Report that "Official development assistance channelled through the United Nations system and other resources for technical cooperation are stagnating or even declining ... While the ILO has so far managed with great effort to maintain and even increase its relative share of the funds available from traditional sources, the absolute volume of such funds has sharply declined and will probably continue to do so". Therefore, it is important for the ILO to seek funds from new sources in order to finance and sustain existing and new fields of technical assistance. Since the ILO has to compete with other organizations for financial resources it is important for it to ensure that the products and services offered under technical assistance are of high quality and relevant to the needs of the recipient countries. We would like to emphasize that the ILO should not make technical assistance conditional upon ratification of any Convention. Nor should technical cooperation be viewed in terms of reward or punishment. To do so will only result in ILO technical assistance being directed to member States least in need of such assistance. This will only help to widen the gap further.

The employer community in Malaysia has always appreciated and accepted the fact that employees are the ultimate resource and sees the need to place great emphasis on developing human resources. In 1993 the Government introduced the Human Resources Development Act, which requires employers in the manufacturing sector to contribute 1 per cent of their payroll to the fund to be used to promote skills. Appreciating the urgent need to equip employees with the skills required to meet ever-changing developments in technology, employers willingly contribute to the fund and are actively involved in training programmes to upgrade the skills of their employees. The good relations between the social partners in Malaysia has enabled the country to achieve a creditable economic growth of 8.6 per cent in 1993, compared with 7.8 per cent in 1992. Malaysia has also been fortunate in that growth has taken place within quite low inflation, which has declined to 3.6 per cent in 1993. Indications for the current year are that GDP growth will still exceed 8 per cent. Thanks to a thriving private sector, unemployment has gone down to under 3 per cent, which means that everyone in the country able to work can find employment. In fact, the country is facing a labour shortage and is host to over 1 million foreign workers.

Our delegation shares the views of the Director-General that the future of the ILO must be seen from the perspective of the international community's determination to be master of its own destiny. Let us not try to reach for an ideal which we know is impossible to achieve.

Mr. THOMAS (Government delegate, Grenada) – On behalf of the Government and people of Grenada and on behalf of my delegation I wish to congratulate the President on his election to the highest position in the 81st Session of the Conference of the International Labour Conference.

I also wish to express thanks to the Director-General for his Report on Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

The Director-General has rightfully remarked that "we are now witnessing a drastic acceleration in the globalization of the economy ... which is a source of hope for some and of distress for others".

Poor, small, Third World countries like my own, Grenada, recognize that this process of globalization has called into question a number of concepts and fixed ideas which we had grown to accept. It is our conviction that while we need change, such change must result in the achievement of overall social justice within the global economy.

Defending values must mean the maintenance and even the enhancement of the standards which the ILO has developed over the years. These standards attempt to ensure for all peoples the elimination of poverty, the development of human rights, equality of opportunity and treatment, and conditions of work that are not degrading. There should not be one standard for members of the EU, NAFTA, the Pacific Rim and countries of the North while there are other standards for the countries of the ACP, the Third World or countries of the South.

The fact is that poverty is increasing among the poorest countries, that over a 30-year period the richest countries increased their share of global GNP from 70.25 per cent to 82.7 per cent and that income inequalities between the top 20 per cent and the bottom 20 per cent of all countries doubled in favour of the richer nations between 1960 and 1989. This tells us that something serious has gone wrong. The ILO's promotion of change must be a step in the right direction.

But the change must not compromise section IV of the Declaration of Philadelphia, part of which I quote: "Confident that the fuller and broader utilization of the world's productive resources necessary for the achievement of the objectives set forth in this Declaration can be secured by effective international and national action, including measures to expand production and consumption, to avoid severe economic fluctuations, to promote the economic and social advancement of the less developed regions of the world, to assure greater stability in world prices of primary products ..."

Let us, as we promote change, help to achieve at least the last part of that quotation. The prices received for primary products of the developing countries are very unstable and able to buy less and less of the manufactured goods of the developed world, which are constantly increasing in price. This means that if there is no stability in the prices paid for primary products, the downward trend of the poor countries will continue.

Despite the gloomy predictions for the Third World, there are signs of improvements in certain areas.

The disintegration of the communist bloc must have been accelerated by the pressures brought to bear by the ILO and its insistence, among other things, on freedom of expression and association. We are, however, distressed by what can be called virtual civil war in Europe, Asia and Africa, and the ILO must therefore, along with the civilized world, redouble efforts towards achieving universal peace.

Recent events in South Africa have given us hope that there can be a solution to the worst problems, but we must not now rest on our laurels. Free elections and the selection of a government representative of all the people of South Africa cannot guarantee proper labour standards, provide more jobs or eliminate discrimination. The ILO's job has therefore now begun. The ILO must provide programmes for job creation, vocational education, the upgrading of labour standards, the promotion of equality, help in accessing long-term economic and development assistance, narrowing the income gap and the development of effective trade unions and employers' organizations with the proper attention and attitude concerning industrial relations.

We note with interest that the ILO's structure has changed from being based on regional centres and technical advisers to the use of multidisciplinary technical teams. We also note the new policy aims. It is yet early to assess the change, but it is Grenada's hope that the Caribbean multidisciplinary team now assembled in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, will provide the advice and guidance which reflect our particular needs.

I cannot conclude without expressing Grenada's best wishes on the celebration of the ILO's 75th anniversary, the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia and, of course, the 25th anniversary of our own Caribbean office.

Time will not allow me to detail the many activities undertaken in Grenada. So far we have had newspaper supplements in four local newspapers, a postal cancellation stamp in use at the General Post Office and a week of activities in the period from 22 to 28 May.

My Government has also agreed to the ratification of Convention No. 87 concerning freedom of association and the protection of the right to organize, Convention No. 100 providing for equal remuneration and Convention No. 144 dealing with tripartite consultation.

Our celebrations include an essay competition open to the 4th and 5th formers of the secondary schools in our country on the topic of "The role and function of the ILO".

Finally, I wish to reiterate Grenada's commitment to the principles of the ILO and I also wish again to extend best wishes on the occasion of the various anniversaries.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative, Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – Permit me on behalf of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and of the entire working population of Africa to congratulate the President and the other Officers of the Conference on their well-merited election. Permit me also to thank the Director-General for his brilliant Report.

On the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, I would like to add our congratulations to our unique Organization, the ILO, for a life devoted to the improvement of the people's working conditions, social justice and the alleviation of poverty throughout the world.

Regarding the past and future work of the ILO, which the Director-General has ably treated in his Report, permit me to make the following observations regarding the ILO mandate, tripartism, employment, structural adjustment, globalization and the ILO and Africa.

Firstly, with regard to the ILO mandate, it is our considered opinion that the ILO should not abandon its raison d'être. It should stick to its core mandate, which was not only relevant yesterday and today, but will continue to be relevant for a long time to come.

When one thoroughly analyses most of the causes of the civil wars and instability in many parts of the world today, one comes to the inescapable conclusion that the lack of social and economic justice for the majority of the peoples of those countries is accountable for them. The selfishness, greed and lack of social conscience of a tiny minority of the peoples of those countries are responsible for this lack of social and economic justice. The push on the international arena for this selfishness, greed and lack of social conscience in the form of neo-liberal economic ideology may be the spark to a social bomb that could destroy our civilization if we do not take care.

This area of social and economic justice is the area in which the ILO has a comparative advantage over all other United Nations agencies, and it is the area in which the ILO has to assert its moral and global authority, now and in the future. This is the way forward for the ILO and its unique global tripartite constituency in order to avoid the looming explosion of social bombs everywhere. Any "new order", whether economic, trading, social or political, which lacks social and economic justice as a basis, will not guarantee lasting peace and prosperity.

On the subject of tripartism, the unique 75 years' experience of the ILO in this area is second to none in the world. We reaffirm our faith in tripartism and the rigorous attachment to and promotion of it by the ILO and its constituents. Tripartism should also be promoted and strengthened at the national level in each ILO member country.

The Director-General's proposal for the inclusion of other social actors in the tripartism of the ILO is not acceptable, as it will complicate rather than enhance the work of the ILO.

Employment has become one of the greatest headaches of all governments, both developed and developing. In our view, the present approach to employment is inadequate and lackadaisical. The ILO should go back to the drawing-board and promote the "basic needs" approach to development, which it championed in the early 1970s. Employment is not only a basic need, but also a fundamental right. Promotion of basic needs, such as employment, food, housing, water, electricity, transport and communications will not only improve the lives of the people, but also contribute to peace and stability.

We reject the spurious arguments of "neo-liberal marketeers" that governments have no business in business. There is no economic law or theory saying governments cannot engage in business or make profits. Governments have both a social and moral responsibility to satisfy the basic needs of their peoples. Business, whether big or small, has neither the social conscience nor the moral obligation to provide for the basic needs of the people. Therefore, African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity join the overwhelming majority of the African peoples in unequivocally demanding and insisting upon the rights of African governments, and of governments throughout the world, for that matter, in engaging in any business of their choice. It is not the business of any undemocratic institution to dictate the path of their economic development to elected democratic governments.

Turning to structural adjustment, while there is consensus for the need of structural adjustment of the economies of the world, there is divergence as to the way and manner this should be carried out. As the time-limit will not allow for detailed elaboration, permit me to say that all the socio-economic interest groups, including the workers and their trade unions should, as a right, be actively involved in deciding the objectives of the structural adjustment, what should be adjusted, what sacrifices should be made, and how the fruits of the adjustment should be equitably shared.

In addition, the socio-economic interest groups should also be actively involved and should participate, along with the governments, in the design, negotiations, implementation, management and monitoring of the structural adjustment programme, whether at the enterprise or the national level. As well enunciated by an African proverb which says "you cannot shave a man's head in his absence", so also should economic decisions that affect people's welfare not be made in their absence or without their consent.

The ILO should therefore assist its tripartite constituents, especially the workers, to strengthen their capacities to effectively play their role in the economic policies of their countries or workplaces.

The ILO should be a major actor or player in the United Nations system and not a fire-fighter or damage controller of the destructive social and economic policies of other United Nations agencies or international institutions.

Globalization means different things to different people. In a discussion with a colleague of mine from an industrialized country a few months ago, I told him what globalization means to people in developing countries. May I have your indulgence and repeat what I told him, "Globalization to the people of developing countries is the cornering of the world trade, economic resources and technology by the transnational corporations for the transnational corporations in the name of the powerful government of industrialized countries, against the present and future interest of humanity". That is what globalization means to the people of the Third World. That is why the transnational corporations have become so powerful and thus uncontrollable, even by their home governments. The preliminary assessment of the recent GATT Agreement of the Uruguay Round by the 30th Assembly of the Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity, which ended in Tunis two days ago, lends justification to my definition of globalization.

Lastly, turning to the ILO and Africa, we would like to see the ILO increase its technical cooperation activities in Africa. The application of ILO standards and supervision in all parts of the world, including Africa, should continue.

The assistance of the ILO to its constituents in Africa, especially workers, in the areas of workers' education, standards, social security, health, safety, environment, women, youth, employment, etc. should be increased to improve the human resource development of their members and the capacity building of their organizations.

We would also like to see a qualitative and quantitative increase in the number of African personnel within the ILO. It is sad to note that Africa is the least represented continent among the top-level personnel of the ILO, and the situation should be urgently readjusted in order to justify the universality of our unique tripartite organization.

In conclusion, I wish the ILO a happy 75th birthday and many years of service to humanity.

Original French: Mr. CECCHETTI (Government delegate, San Marino) – I should like, first of all, on behalf of my delegation, to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and wish them every success in their work.

Our congratulations and thanks also go to the Director-General for his Report, Defending values, promoting change, which he has submitted to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. Whereas we might have expected that this Session would be given over to festivities of all kinds, it has, in fact, been called upon to examine a document which invites us to reflect upon the role, structure and future function of the ILO.

After describing the Organization's terms of reference within the United Nations system, the Report then goes on to note political, economic and social changes which have occurred on the world scene and concludes that the ILO must take a fresh look at its own objectives if it is to be able to play fully its role of promoting and guaranteeing social justice.

The Republic of San Marino is in full agreement with the proposals of the Director-General, and agrees that it is vital that we join together to rethink, improve and reorient our activities to meet the needs of today's world – and the world of tomorrow; and that our final objective is to ensure that each and every person has access to employment in conditions of human dignity, where he or she can fulfil their potential and develop their natural talent and creative skills.

In this context, I should like to point out that in the Constitution of the Republic of San Marino, work is defined as the right and duty of every citizen. This universal principle is also translated into reality, thanks to the joint commitment of the Government and the social partners. Consequently, we believe firmly that tripartism is a principle which we must continue to uphold because it is still just as important today as it was in the past.

Reiterating and upholding the standards and principles which were a source of inspiration to the founders of the ILO, i.e. safeguarding fundamental human rights and the principles stated in the Declaration of Philadelphia, is no less important today than it was at the time. It is fair to say that there can be no economic development unless it is accompanied by very specific guarantees to promote the liberty, safety and the dignity of workers.

In addition to striving for fair and balanced economic development, and this applies particularly to the countries which are still trying to establish their own appropriate economic structures, care must also be taken to safeguard the rights of all those who, by their labours, contribute to such development.

The level and type of social protection we try to introduce must not hamper development and economic growth, indeed, the economy must be able to develop in a context of freedom and in conditions where respect is due to everyone.

Economic structures are constantly changing and adapting as new goods and services emerge, in particular as a result of the introduction of increasingly sophisticated technologies; by the same token, social protection standards must also be subject to a constant process of study and review.

In the opinion of the Republic of San Marino, some of the ILO's Conventions need to be reviewed and updated in the light of the economic and social upheavals which have occurred since these standards were adopted. With particular reference to the Conventions guaranteeing the fundamental rights of individuals, the ILO should strive to ensure that all its member States comply with them in law and in practice, as a sign of its firm determination to pursue the ultimate objective of universal social justice.

As the Director-General states, the ILO must continue to provide assistance and appropriate technical and legal cooperation to the developing countries.

Statistics relating to poverty, unemployment, underemployment and the "new forms of poverty" – to which the Director-General refers in his Report – could generate a sense of pessimism and distrust; and I would like to say that this sense of distrust is probably the worst scourge of our age.

For my part, I have every confidence in human beings. I have every confidence in peoples' resourcefulness, in their ability to discuss and find together the best ways of reconciling well-being and social justice.

In conclusion, I would say that the Republic of San Marino lends its full support to the Report of the Director-General and believes that his proposals are capable of giving renewed impetus to the Organization, so that it might reach its objectives and uphold the principles set out in its Constitution.

The World Summit for Social Development, which is due to take place in Copenhagen in 1995, is an event which keenly interests the Republic of San Marino and in which it places great hopes. The Republic sincerely hopes that the ILO, the leaders within the United Nations and the representatives of the social partners will be able to make a constructive contribution to the discussions and conclusions which will be adopted at that Summit.

For my part, my country sincerely hopes that at Copenhagen, as at Geneva within the ILO, all our discussions will pursue as a ultimate objective the enhancement and dignity of the individual.

Mr. BAROT (Workers' delegate, India) – On behalf of over 250,000,000 working people, and on my own behalf, I extend to the President our hearty congratulations and warm greetings on his election to preside over this historic session. Delegates representing governments, employers and workers of 171 countries are gathered here on this momentous occasion to celebrate this 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, the oldest and only tripartite agency of the United Nations, with the ideal of securing universal social justice. This session also coincides with the 50th anniversary of the adoption of the historic Declaration of Philadelphia, which proclaimed that poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere. It is, therefore, in the fitness of things that a representative of the producers of wealth has been unanimously chosen to guide the deliberations in this session. The Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization, Mr. Boutros-Ghali, and others, have addressed this session – which only reflects the importance of this Organization.

Starting with an initial membership of 44 in 1919, the ILO is today truly universal, having 171 member States representing about 98 per cent of the world's population. India, as a founder member of the ILO, is proud in celebrating the 75th anniversary of this great Organization. Progressive labour policies of our country have been largely influenced by the standards set by the ILO. Indian labour laws have ben guided by ILO Conventions and Recommendations. India is ahead of many member States in ratifying ILO Conventions, and we have the proud record of having ratified 36 Conventions. A few more are in the process of ratification in this 75th anniversary year of this Organization that has as its objective: the constant improvement in the standards of living of men and women all over the world; the relentless fight against ignorance, misery and poverty; and the promotion of universal peace. As the Declaration of Philadelphia indicates, the war against want requires to be carried on with unrelenting vigour and by continuous and concerted efforts of workers, employers and governments.

The Indian National Trade Union Congress, the country's premier trade union centre, with which I am associated, has been, since its formation in 1947, contributing to and interacting with the ILO. It enjoys the record of being represented on the Governing Body of the ILO for the past several years.

The collapse of communism and globalization of the economy at a breath-taking speed, coupled with revolutionizing technological innovations and the consequent incomprehensible change in the world of work, have led to the proliferation of social and labour problems and a widening of the inequalities between States and within States, thus posing a challenge to the ILO in its mission for world peace by promoting social justice. I therefore compliment the Director-General for presenting to this session a set of precise and specific proposals for the agenda of the ILO in the present changing world. In the introduction to his Report, Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, The Director-General has rightly stressed that tripartism is the most effective means to the realization of the ideal of social justice.

The main fall-out of globalization is that the quest for a new international economic order to ensure balanced development of the world has been given up. The inequalities between nations and within nations continue to widen. The hopes of promoting economic development of the poor countries and reducing the disparities at the heart of the world economy have been totally belied. "Between 1960 and 1989, the countries with the richest 20 per cent of the world population increased their share of global GNP from 70.2 per cent to 82.7 per cent. The countries with the poorest 20 per cent of the world population saw their share fall from 2.3 per cent to 1.4 per cent. The consequences for income inequalities have been dramatic. In 1960, the top 20 per cent received 30 times more than the bottom 20 per cent, but by 1989 they were receiving 60 times more. This growing disparity in income levels shows no signs of abating". At this point, I cannot help recalling the words of our all-pervasive leader, Mahatma Gandhi, that "the world has enough for man's need and not for man's greed". So, we will remember that. It was Mahatma Gandhi also who was responsible for promoting one union in India, and he formed the union which was known as the Textile Labour Association in 1917.

Another alarming outcome of liberalization in a free-market economy governed by market forces is the rapid growth of foreign investment. The Director-General has referred to the study conducted by UNCTAD, according to which the "impact on the world economy of the 37,000 (non-financial) multinational enterprises doing business in the early 1990s continues to increase. (There were only 7,000 such firms 20 years ago.) The sales of multinational enterprises outside their home countries in 1992 amounted to US$5,500 billion – considerably more than the world's total exports of goods and services, which came to US$4,000 billion, and trade between the subsidiaries of the multinationals accounted for one-third of this figure".

According to the International Metalworkers' Federation, just 1,000 global companies have a market value of US$7,727 billion – more than the size of the United States economy and five times more than the size of the leading European economies. There is no evidence of the multinationals transferring their latest technology or helping generate employment in the host countries in the Third World. Unionization is being discouraged, and the laws of the country pertaining to labour are blatantly flouted. Basic human rights and trade union rights are grossly violated. Further, the established domestic industries are forced to face the prospect of ultimate closure because of the unfair competition from the multinationals with their superior technology. This leads to more unemployment and the adoption of a market economy enjoins the withdrawal of a State's intervention from the economic sector.

The time has come for the three constituents of this tripartite organization to think of some special transnational mechanisms so that the ILO principles are incorporated in the employment and human resource policies of these determinant global employers.

I fully agree with the Director-General that poverty and unemployment are endemic to our planet and no country can ever hope to resolve the problem on its own. In India, these two problems continue to defy solutions. Ever since independence, 39.3 per cent of our population continue to languish below the poverty line despite the tremendous advance made in many industrial sectors. The projection of unemployment by 2000 AD is 106 million. I fully subscribe to the Director-General's view that labour legislation alone is not enough for every person to have the opportunity to find employment. The last World Employment Conference was held way back in 1976. Therefore, I would like to suggest that the ILO should take the initiative to launch another World Employment Programme, and a special session of this body should be convened for the purpose of looking at the problem of unemployment throughout the world.

The Director-General has referred to the move from some of the constituents of the ILO to bring labour standards within the purview of the World Trade Organization by incorporating a social clause into multilateral trade agreements. We do not accept the linkage of labour standards with trade. It is nothing but a disguised justification for new forms of protectionism. It is an attempt to return to protectionism and impose non-tariff barriers; levying a countervailing duty on imports from developing countries aimed at offsetting labour costs is tantamount to asking the poorer nations to pay for their poverty. It is obvious that this sudden concern about the plight of labour in the Third World is only to deprive the developing countries of their only competitive advantage. The social clause is a punitive clause loaded too heavily against the developing countries.

Child labour is a phenomenon which is more important as far as we are concerned. The estimated figure of child labour all over the world is about 200 million, but the existence of the child and bonded labour is a legacy of the colonial rulers, who never wanted the long-term development of their colonies.

Our Labour Minister, in his address to the previous session of this Conference, effectively pointed out that child labour is a silent and tragic emergency of our times. We should tenaciously investigate all the feasible modalities.

Mr. SUNDERAM (Workers' delegate, Sri Lanka) – It is my great pleasure and honour to address this august assembly, as the Workers' delegate of Sri Lanka, on the historic occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and of the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, and to congratulate my colleague and friend Charles Gray on his election as President of this session of the International Labour Conference – a well-deserved tribute to a dedicated trade unionist who has served the cause of labour with great distinction.

I would like to extend the fraternal greetings of my own organization, the Ceylon Workers' Congress, and the other two workers' organizations, the Yathika Sevaka Sangamaya and the Lanka Yathika Estate Workers' Union to this Conference.

It also gives me great satisfaction to extend a special welcome to the delegation of the first non-racist democratically elected Government in South Africa and in particular to salute the independent trade union organizations for their courageous struggle to end apartheid and achieve the liberation of their country.

Since its inception, the ILO over the past 75 years has an impressive record of achievement in improving the conditions of work and promoting the economic and social security of workers. Much has been done but much more requires to be done in the face of new and increasing challenges in a changing world.

It is therefore of paramount importance that we should take this opportunity at this historic session to focus on the tools, methods and structures that are necessary to equip the Organization to achieve its central objective of social justice and peace. I am indeed grateful to the Director-General for his thought-provoking Report, which should facilitate a stimulating discussion leading to practical conclusions for the guidance of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

The Declaration of Philadelphia, which highlights employment promotion and poverty alleviation, is not only of special significance to workers but is, indeed, an imperative for sustainable development. Despite the endeavours of the ILO and other relevant international organizations, it is distressing to note that inequality between States and within States has increased and unemployment and poverty have grown to alarming proportions.

The UNDP Human Development Report of 1992 highlights the position starkly. To our dismay, poverty has spread in the developing world. There are many countries caught in the vice of the international debt crisis, which have experienced a reduction in per capita income. But what is important to note is that poverty has increased not merely due to a lowering of incomes but also on account of increased inequality within these countries, and even though there has been a fall in poverty, as in certain Asian countries, an improvement in the distribution of incomes has not taken place.

As the Director-General states, the challenge for the ILO is "how to guarantee fair treatment and protection for those who are most vulnerable". The constructive proposals which the Director-General makes to cope with this crisis, and those which he will formulate in the future, should not be based on the misconceived idea that employment can be promoted by withdrawing existing workers' protection. It is fundamentally wrong and a violation of its mandate for the ILO to accept the notion that a reduction in the quality of employment is justified by an increase in the quantity. In the light of the challenges with which it is faced, the ILO needs to formulate and implement, in association with other relevant multilateral institutions, a comprehensive strategy for protecting and promoting employment and alleviating poverty globally.

There can be no question that the ILO must respond to the changes that are taking place in the world by reviewing and revamping its methods and programmes of action in order to ensure that its objectives as enshrined in the Preamble to the ILO's Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia remain inviolate. It is particularly heartening that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in his inspiring address at this session, should have called upon us to mark the 75th anniversary by rereading the Declaration of Philadelphia and rededicating ourselves to its principles and ethics in order to chart a course of action for the future. We are encouraged by the emphasis that the Secretary-General has placed on the need to guarantee the right to work as an essential ingredient of human dignity in the context of worldwide unemployment which he alludes to as "a permanent reproach to all our societies". His stern warning that the increase of poverty, particularly in the developing countries, and the rise in world unemployment have created new tensions that threaten international peace and security, brings into sharp relief the need for the ILO to address itself with renewed vigour to a major responsibility that is central to its core mandate.

The World Summit for Social Development, scheduled to take place next year, presents the ILO with an unparalleled opportunity to apply its outstanding experience and expertise relating to the social dimension of development and the pursuit of social justice acquired over a 75-year span, and to play a leading role, not only in the preparatory work for the Summit but in ensuring that it realizes its purpose of formulating policies and measures to alleviate and reduce poverty, to promote productive employment and to enhance social integration. It is also of great significance that the Secretary-General of the United Nations has assured the ILO, in his address, that it will have a leading role in implementing the recommendations and programme of action resulting from the Summit. Needless to say, the workers and their organizations look forward to full tripartite participation in the Summit and its follow-up with great expectations, and this should give the ILO a new and much needed impetus in the pursuit of its goal of social justice.

The dignity of working people is given pride of place in the Declaration of Philadelphia which proclaims that "labour is not a commodity". However, what is the reality after 75 years of the ILO's existence? Despite the end of the Cold War and the winds of democratic change that are alleged to be sweeping across the world, freedom of association and expression are being violated with impunity by authoritarian regimes as well as so-called democracies. The conclusions of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association bear ample testimony to the continuing violation of human and trade union rights. It is therefore gratifying that the Director-General has recognized that human rights is a high priority responsibility of the ILO in its task of promoting social justice and particularly vis-à-vis the application of the Conventions which relate to freedom of association, forced labour and discrimination, which are of vital importance to workers and their organizations.

It is unfortunate that the proposal to introduce a social clause has given rise to fears and anxieties about its impact on developing countries. It is imperative that a serious dialogue should be initiated and continued under the auspices of the ILO between the protagonists of the social clause and those opposed to it in order to allay such fears and misgivings, as the consequences of failure to reach an accord could result in the imposition of protectionist barriers, and could impede the beneficial effects of the recent Uruguay Round and possibly lead to a trade war detrimental to workers' interests.

It is unfortunate that the international financial institutions, notably the IMF and the World Bank, have failed to take into account social and labour priorities and involve workers' and employers' organizations in the formulation of structural adjustment programmes. The ILO must play a positive role to assist the social partners to participate actively in developing balanced and socially acceptable adjustment programmes and to ensure that it is accorded the status of an equal partner with the Bretton Woods institutions in promoting the social dimension in structural adjustment.

Tripartism represents the life and soul of the ILO and gives it its main strength. The Organization should reinforce tripartism at the national subregional and regional levels and give priority assistance to workers' organizations to participate effectively in the formulation and implementation of economic and social policy. This should be considered a priority task by the newly appointed multidisciplinary teams.

International labour standards and the mechanisms for their supervision go to the heart of the ILO mandate. The ILO's standard-setting work must continue and should include the revision of existing instruments, where necessary. The failure of certain governments to apply basic standards and their refusal to comply with the rulings of the ILO's supervisory bodies causes serious concern. It is imperative that all ILO constituents should uphold the authority of these bodies and their established jurisprudence. The "soft law" approach of the Director-General is therefore not acceptable. On the contrary, innovative methods should be used to apply standards more widely and effectively and, in particular, priority should be given to the application of standards on freedom of association, discrimination and forced and child labour.

In conclusion, I wish this 75th anniversary session of the Conference success in charting a course which will generate a new momentum in the achievement of our cherished goal of peace and prosperity based on social justice for all.

Ms. ROOS (Employers' delegate, Estonia) – It is a real pleasure for me to say a few words on behalf of the delegation of the Republic of Estonia. I should like to begin by congratulating the ILO on its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It is a real case for celebration. In this context, I should note that to commemorate these events the International Conference of Social Security and Market Economy was organized by the Estonian Tripartite Council and the Ministry of Social Affairs of Estonia and held from 13 to 15 April 1994 in Tallinn. This is proof that the ILO's principles of social justice and tripartite cooperation have found a favourable echo in Estonia in its transition to a market economy. On behalf of the Estonian Tripartite ILO Council, I wholeheartedly thank the ILO Governing Body, in particular the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and the Director of the Europe Regional Office, Mr. Oscar de Vries Reilingh, for their kind support and assistance to the Conference.

On behalf of Estonian employers, allow me to dwell upon that part of the subject that touches the activities and attitudes of the Employers' Confederation of Estonia in connection with the social security of employees in the privatization process and partnership at all levels.

As characteristic to the whole world, unities are created, later reorganized according to the development of the economy. The Confederation of Estonian Industry was established in 1992, taking into account such a development. The CEI is the main defender of the interests of the main branches of industry and a confederation of the unions of branches of industry.

The CEI is a confederation of 13 unions of industrial branches and large industrial private companies. The establishment of a stock company fell into the period when Estonia got back its rights in the ILO. The Confederation of Estonian Industry comprises currently about 110,000 industrial workers in the Republic having assembled 11 large industrial branch associations such as machine-building, electronics and electrical engineering, chemical, paper, food-processing, woodworking industries and fishing.

In accordance with the trends of the ILO, the fundamental aim of the CEI was changed. Its main function became the protection of the interests of industrial branches and industrial enterprises in the legislation process, helping to sort out disputes with the representatives of employers, ensuring agreements between unions representing employers and the Government.

The principles of the CEI for organizing the social security of workers are as follows: bilateral cooperation; settlement of disputes between employers and employees on an equal level; collective agreement; continuous cooperation with the Government; and organizing consultations for the development of legislation concerning social affairs; participation in the unions of employers; and cooperation with the Government and representatives of employers.

The CEI regards the approach to employment relationships as an important element in deciding how the head of an authoritative company accords with the demands of the market economy. It sees bilateral benefit in collective agreements: an agreement is a warrant of the working peace for the workers; working relations are regulated in detail in it; it gives the workers adequate information about the events in the enterprise – it is a source of information.

The CEI has achieved cooperation with the Government. Meetings with members of the Government have taken place, and the perspectives of the development of industry and relevant questions about privatization have been discussed. Joint consultations with the Ministry of Social Affairs were organized. The consultations regarded the governmental regulations and legislation in the field of social affairs, for instance, discussions regarding additional vacations, shortened working days in case of unhealthy jobs, underground jobs and special jobs, the Bill on Social Care, etc. We participate in the tripartite negotiations of the Committee on Health Insurance in the development of additional bills to be included in the Law on Pensions. These additional bills are related to special conditions for old-age pensions and pensions for years actually worked.

We see a direct need for the employers to participate in organizing training improving the qualifications of adults in order to decrease unemployment.

We participate in the activities of the Training Centre of the Technical University of Tallinn, where we see a good perspective of training highly qualified leaders of economy.

Our participation in the Expert Committee of the Ministry of Culture and Education is aimed at supporting the development of the structures of educational institutions and at developing cooperation between employers and training institutions. Our common request to the Parliament about special tax conditions in the new income tax law for employers active in organizing training and qualification courses originates from this Expert Committee.

The law now accepted has made it possible to reduce the costs of training and qualifications to be paid out of the income of a company.

The CEI has had good cooperation with the Association of Estonian Trade Unions since the early days of our activities.

The positive attitude of the Minister of Social Affairs in introducing the draft regulations and possibilities of consulting them have made it possible to organize common information days with the Labour Inspectorate, the Ministry of Culture and Education and the Central Board of Trade Unions of Estonia.

Transition stage and privatization process has reduced the members of trade unions. In new companies, small companies, the defender of the rights of the workers is missing and the employer does not have anybody to dispute with.

The income of foreign capital should enable the maintenance of present rates of employment in Estonia, but at present the process goes vice versa.

The training centres located at once large enterprises have been mostly liquidated now. Therefore, our employers do not have anybody to whom they could turn with their questions regarding working security.

We are accustomed to working out new trends, discussing the main principles of activities and collecting opinions only on the highest level. At the same time we have neglected the representatives of employers and employees in situ, although they, the direct tax payers, have a big part in organizing the social security system and in developing the wage and working conditions. As a result, several of the decisions are not fulfilled; even more, quite often nobody knows anything about the existence of such decisions.

In our future activities we regard as important: the ratification of the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173), by our Government. This Convention under discussion in the Estonian Council; implementation of the Law on Collective Agreements of Estonia at all levels; finding means for the acceptance of the Law on the Social Security of Employees through tripartite consultations with the Government; and to finish preliminary work on the establishment of a voluntary system of security that would supplement social security at the state level.

We, the employers' Confederation, consider the directions of work of the International Labour Organization as a coordinating force and taking them into consideration we are doing our best to create just the kind of reliable economic and social policy that is needed by everybody in Estonia.

I wish you all very fruitful discussions and a successful Conference.

Original Laotian: Mr. SISOULITH (Government delegate, Lao People's Democratic Republic) – The delegation of the Lao People's Democratic Republic is deeply honoured and pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the present Conference of the International Labour Organization, which is celebrating its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I would like to extend my congratulations to Mr. Charles Gray, who has been unanimously elected President of the 81st Session of the Conference and I am deeply convinced that with his skills and experience this Conference will indeed be most successful.

I wish to present my congratulations to the Director-General of the ILO for the important and informative Report he has presented, emphasizing social equality and justice and the associated issues currently faced by all nations.

During the last 75 years, the ILO has not only been a centre for coordination and exchanges of experience, data and information concerning labour between member countries but has also provided timely information about experiences and technical recommendations on labour management, services and development to member countries, while encouraging them to formulate provisions and regulations with the aim of bringing about justice and equality and reducing all forms of unfair advantage between employers and workers. At the same time, the ILO has acted as a substantial tripartite coordinator with the aim of establishing common responsibilities for the positive development of social justice.

The delegation of the Lao People's Democratic Republic has carefully examined the content of the Director-General's Report and agrees that equality and justice are not only currently threatened in the developing countries but are also major issues in the developed world.

The causes of the above problems include the uncertainty of labour, technological changes, market pressures and competition in business, which have a severe impact on the stability of employment.

The Lao People's Democratic Republic is engaged in a comprehensive renewal process and is developing extended external economic cooperation. Our country is also firmly turning to the market economy. Based on the Lao Government's policy and provision of full facilities for the promotion of foreign investment, including socio-economic development plans which focus on the country's potential in terms of natural resources and its excellent geographic location, the Lao People's Democratic Republic is a major and interesting point of attraction for foreign investment. To date, our Government has licensed about 500 foreign investment projects from some 30 countries whose estimated value is US$800 million.

It is expected that by the year 2000 foreign investment will amount to more than US$2 billion.

Simultaneously with economic development the Government of the Lao People's Democratic Republic foresees and is planning ahead in order to counter potential negative influences on social issues. The Government, therefore, needs to apply adjustment measures, for example industrial development planning will formulate periodical and continuous programmes with a view to reducing unemployment. Lao economic structures should be such as to encourage the simultaneous development of industry, agriculture and services, since the sectors of agriculture and services in Lao, in addition to their role of national economic impetus for the establishment of a basis for industrial development, will help to provide continuous employment for a great number of individuals. The issues which remain to be solved in the immediate future are the development of labour skills and stable services simultaneously with the creation of year-round employment in rural areas for farmers. It is to this end that the Government is focusing on the development of an adequate infrastructure for future development.

Our Government has the firm intention of protecting and developing social equality and justice through the Constitution and through rules and laws. For instance, on 1 July 1994 a new labour law and a new foreign investment protection and promotion act will be promulgated whereby the Lao Government has tried to adapt the new conditions with the aim of managing and protecting the interests of the State, employers and workers, to establish appropriate policies on wages, female labour and limitation working hours to of an eight-hour day, with strict measures against any transgression, such as forced labour, child labour, etc. An important point of the new labour law is its emphasis on the right to employment for all, without discrimination based on ethnicity, sex or economic, social or political status, and the right to establish associations for the protection of their interests. In the preparation of this new draft law, the Lao Government has received cooperation and advice from ILO experts.

Positive principles for the development of social justice and equality will most certainly be implemented in any country that intends to guarantee improved living conditions to the whole of its population, and where political and economic stability and steady development prevail. The development of social justice and equality will be gradually attained in this way. The Government of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, although it has not adopted all of the ILO Conventions has implemented them and no problems relating to the ILO fundamental principles have yet arisen, as has been reported to the ILO in our regular reports on the implementation of these principles. Our Government has also closely cooperated with the regional ILO office in Bangkok and several projects have received assistance and support from the ILO.

Due to the fact that the Lao People's Democratic Republic will conduct its socio-economic development along the principles of restructuring, meeting the requirements for the development of human resources in order to support the increasing number of new programmes will call for additional assistance and support from the ILO and other international organizations, including friendly countries, and it is sincerely hoped that such assistance will be provided, for which the delegates of the Lao People's Democratic Republic wish to take this opportunity to express their most sincere thanks.

May the Conference be successful in attaining its goals.

Mr. RAMAN (Workers delegate, Fiji) – I join the other speakers who have taken the rostrum before me in congratulating the President on his election to the high office of this great Organization. I do so with a special sense of pride as Mr. Gray is a colleague of mine of long standing whose qualifications to occupy this high office are second to none.

Also on this historic occasion, as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, I bring to this Conference warm greetings and best wishes from the workers of Fiji.

Turning to the Director-General's Report, which is the subject of our current discussion, I must compliment him and his staff on the Report, which I believe is complete in providing the necessary details and is adequately incisive and visionary to provide the basis for a progressive and constructive appraisal of the achievement of the values the ILO stands for.

The necessity which motivated the establishment of the ILO some 75 years ago is just as relevant today as it was then and this must be seen as an indictment of the present generation. Whilst the advancement mankind has achieved in a whole variety of fields, especially in the technological field, would have been unimaginable 75 years ago, the lust of people in positions of power, both economic and political, to suppress and exploit the weak and the helpless is just as prevalent today as it was then.

The irony of it is that the exploitation of workers and the suppression of trade unions are carried out in the name of structural readjustment of the economies in many countries as a result of stipulations imposed by none other than the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank which are all arms of the United Nations. So we have on the one hand an international agency like the ILO utilizing enormous resources and energy in trying to alleviate exploitation and promote social justice, and we have on the other hand international agencies like the IMF and the World Bank who are acting as a parallel counterforce in propagating economic policies which compel governments to adopt measures aimed at eroding the conditions and standards achieved by many countries over many years of hard labour, and reducing workers to exploitative and poverty levels. In most if not all cases, these policies are thrust on the workers by first weakening their collective strength through measures aimed at drastically curtailing the rights of the trade unions. To overcome the problems created by the conflicting advice and services provided by the various United Nations agencies to the constituent governments, I suggest that all these agencies should first consult with all the social partners in the given countries instead of prescribing doctrines that cause irreparable damage.

The Government of Fiji fell victim to such structural adjustment philosophies when it unquestioningly espoused IMF-conceived policies of deregulation, privatization and value added tax in the face of strong opposition put up by the trade union movement. The Government's deregulation policy is slowly but surely destroying Fiji's industrial base and the jobs of Fijian workers are being taken away to the benefit of workers abroad as the markets are opened up to unrestricted imports.

The introduction of the value added tax has shifted the burden of taxation from the rich and well-to-do to the poor and helpless in society. On the one hand, direct income tax has been reduced whilst 10 per cent has been imposed on all consumer items, irrespective of ability to pay. Hence, one of the basic tenets of social justice – that the strong and wealthy pay more than the weak and helpless – has been chucked out. The end result naturally is that the poor are getting poorer and the rich richer.

The worst aspect of the IMF's structural adjustment policies that the Fiji Government adopted and has put into effect was that relating to the deregulation of the labour market. On this pretext the Government, through decrees issued in 1991 when there was a military-backed interim Government in place, imposed changes to the labour laws aimed at virtually crippling the trade unions. The Government has openly admitted that the curtailment of the freedom and power of trade unions was an essential prerequisite in pursuing the policies of economic structural adjustment as prescribed by the International Monetary Fund. The trade union movement in Fiji, led by the Fiji Trades Union Congress, protested vehemently against the imposition of this suppressive legislation, including by means of a report to the ILO, through the ICFTU, against the Fiji Government for violating ILO Conventions and standards. We are grateful to the ILO Governing Body for accepting our report and are pleased to note that the Committee on Freedom of Association has upheld our complaint that the legislative measures imposed by the Fiji Government in 1991 do in fact violate ILO Conventions in several respects. The Fiji Government has responded only nominally to the Committee's call for remedial action by withdrawing two minor aspects of the labour reform. The oppressive and objectionable aspects of the labour reforms still remain in the statute books. Therefore the Fiji Trades Union Congress will continue its fight to have the suppressive laws removed. Indeed we request the ILO to continue with its intervention and to hold the Fiji Government indicted unless and until the Government ceases to offend ILO Conventions and standards by taking remedial legislative measures.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that political leaders and economic planners are targeting the trade union movement and workers to facilitate the realization of their plans for economic development. However, in their obsession to achieve their goal, they lose sight of the very aim and purpose of such development, which must be the uplifting and advancement of the human race. Looking at the decline in standards of living that many countries of the world are experiencing, it is abundantly clear that they have lost their direction. There is a serious derailment of the objectives that the economic development efforts should be striving to achieve. Responsibility to put matters right falls to the ILO, which must pursue more vigorously its charter, which is to accomplish and promote social justice for all the people of the world. For the weak and the helpless of the world the ILO is still the only hope. In conclusion, I thank the President for giving me the opportunity to address this historic Conference.

Original Spanish: Mr. DUTAN ERRAEZ (Workers' delegate, Ecuador) – On behalf of the workers of Ecuador, I would like to congratulate the President on his election to chair this 81st Session of the Conference.

I also wish to congratulate the Director-General for having submitted such relevant issues in his important Report. First of all I would like to say something about the basic concepts put forward in the Report of the Director-General.

Unforeseeable changes have occurred in the world, and we are now living at a time of globalization. The centres of decision-making and power now transcend borders.

When we speak of globalization of capital, we refer not only to the internationalization of the relationship between capital and labour and the constitution of a world market under the aegis of the international financial institutions, as the Director-General emphasizes in his Report, but also to the globalization of the power structure, the creation of an integrated area of domination and the intention to impose a homogeneous culture worldwide.

Following the fall of the Berlin Wall a unilateral order was imposed, dominated by the Western countries of the Northern hemisphere. The Cold War did not end, but a winner emerged – capitalism.

The new power is based on the creation of a world State centred around global institutions, in particular the United Nations and the international financial organizations, such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The counterpart is the decline of the nation State.

Five years ago capitalism celebrated its victory over socialism and the apparent success of its experiments in neo-liberalism.

The paradox today, however, is that the victory of north-western civilization is occurring as it is in a period of decadence.

Five years later the new world order, made in the image of the capitalist transnational, is reaching its limits.

One of the clearest signs of this is Yugoslavia, in the heart of Europe; the new imperial geopolitical interests have ended in a fundamentalist confrontation between the three main civilizations now tearing each other apart – the Slavic Orthodox Christian, Western Christian and Muslim civilizations.

After five years of unilateral domination of transnational capitalism, the gap between rich and poor countries has widened. In 1969 the richest 20 per cent of the world population had an income 30 times that of the poorest 20 per cent.

The result is a world split in two, where 20 per cent of the people have access to the advantages of the technical and scientific revolution, while not only peoples, but whole countries and continents, are simply discarded.

The developing countries, with 75 per cent of the world population, barely represent 19 per cent of world GDP, their share having dropped by 23 per cent over the last decade. The share of Latin America in the world market has dropped from 7 to 4 per cent. Let us not therefore be surprised if we see that the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC) has noted that the number of people living below the poverty level in Latin America has increased from 112 to 184 million. This represents half of the population of Latin America.

The new world order has not prevented the degradation of the environment. This degradation is only one of the many dire consequences of this development model based on the search for economic growth and consumption, excluding human and environmental interests.

In the case of Latin America, the flow of capital abroad between 1980 and 1990, solely for the servicing of the external debt, was US$200,000 million, which represents 25 per cent of domestic savings. If we add to this capital flight and other payments, then the figure is more than double that, and represents 50 per cent of savings.

Our countries have achieved some signs of growth however. The developing countries maintained a steady growth rate of 5.1 per cent between 1991 and 1994. Nevertheless, the Gordian knot is still there: this growth has not led to a real accumulation of wealth but rather flows towards the imperial centres.

This growth has been achieved at high social costs and led to a deterioration in the standard of living of our peoples. Neo-liberal policies have led to a recovery of macroeconomic indicators, but have distorted the base of our economic development and mortgaged our sovereignty. Privatization policies and the total opening up of markets have eroded the possibilities of integrated human development of our countries.

A new paradox arises. The spread of democracy has not led to more rights and greater well-being for most of the world's population. It is a democracy of exclusion.

The East-West confrontation that characterized the twentieth century is now being replaced by a North-South confrontation that lies beyond the optimistic vision contained in the Report of the Director-General, who said that South is no longer the antithesis of North. However, this is no longer just a confrontation between socio-economic systems, but a battle of civilizations: but what is at stake is the meaning of human history. The confrontation is between the new world order and the new utopia.

The globalization made possible by the scientific and technical revolution created for the first time conditions in which humanity could be the shaper of its own history.

But in the form of transnational capitalism, the result does not give cause for new hopes for most of humanity.

We have to draw a distinction between globalization and world capitalism. The challenge here is to find new paths of civilization that can guide the new world order in a different direction. This is where the task of the ILO lies; this is how it can adjust its role to new conditions.

The resistance and utopia of the South: five years after the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Western illusion of imposing a capitalist utopia as the sole path for humanity has started to reach its limits.

The Chiapas indigenous uprising in Mexico is an explosive sign of the divergence in a divided world. At the same time as local financial groups have set their hopes on the North with the entry into force of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), the Indian peoples and the social partners have testified to the collapse of the neo-liberal dream. The fires of revolt had already risen in the Palestinian intifada, the Caracazo in Venezuela and the San Francisco del Estero uprising in Argentina.

In our country too the workers and the popular movement are proposing alternatives to the intentions of the Government and the monopolies, which are trying to impose their fundamentalist neo- liberalism, which in fact comes down to changes in labour legislation with the introduction of greater flexibility in the Labour Code, allowing excessive exploitation in the form of subcontracting and part-time work, etc.

The Labour Code amendments were designed to eliminate a range of rights acquired by the workers over its 55 years in force. As a result the trade unions are subjugated, making it easier to dismiss workers and engage in fraudulent bankruptcy, ultimately destroying the organized resistance of the workers' movement.

The present Government has further developed this deathly model, with the imposition of the Law on Modernization, aimed primarily at privatizing enterprises and cutting back the State. So far 28,300 persons are reported to have been laid off; their fate is totally uncertain, and 25,000 more persons face redundancy in the course of this year.

Privatization of key businesses, in addition to being unconstitutional, robs the Ecuadorians of their social heritage, with dire consequences, since the sole aim of privatization is to make these enterprises more profitable – that is, we are having to pay the bill, ruling out any possibility of subsidies for needy sectors.

It is faced with models such as these that the United Workers' Front and indigenous and people's organizations have decided to join forces and mobilize themselves.

We see a new polarization between neo-liberal forces and the search for alternatives.

The end of apartheid and the ANC victory in South Africa and the peace accords reached by the Palestinian people are signs that the democratic forces in the world are recovering.

On our continent, despite a political ideological context, characterized by the hegemony of conservative ideas – especially neo-liberal ideas – as regards the organization of the economy and the functioning of the State and society, there is a clear electoral tendency towards the Left and democratic positions. In Brazil, the PT has come first in pre-election polls; the PRD is back in power in Panama; in El Salvador the FMLN is the second-strongest party, as is the Frente Grande in Argentina; and the PRD has a clear chance of winning in Mexico.

This resistance has worried the imperial centres and international organizations, which are beginning to speak of the need to give capitalism a human face. Fundamentalist neo-liberalism is beginning to be called into question in the ideological strongholds of the industrialized countries. There is a return to a neo-developmentalist approach, with social compensations to make the dictatorship of the market more attractive.

Our peoples have inexhaustible sources of an alternative approach to life. Solidarity and a harmonious relationship with nature, the strength of a direct democracy which would make it possible for there to be growing control by society over the State and the market, respect for diversity, a dream of freedom and equality – all these can still form the basis of a new destiny for humanity.

International organizations such as the ILO cannot become the mouthpieces of an ideology that justifies the capitalist utopia by providing it with a human face. Their role is to contribute to creating an alternative vision of civilization.

The choice before the workers of the world, including those in the countries of the North, is not between the virulent neo-liberal model and progressive capitalism with a human face, but between the limits of a decadent Western civilization and the possibility of building a new world order on the contributions of the potential of all peoples.

The ILO, based on its founding ideal, that of promoting social justice in the world, is in a special position to take up this task, first of all by becoming a forum for the discussion of alternative proposals on a worldwide scale. Tripartism ensures that there can be a direct dialogue between the main parties in our society in order to seek agreements that cannot be limited to the unilateral imposition of one ideology.

Is the choice going to be to continue on a path of economic development that subjugates human beings and destroys the environment? Or to restore the meaning of history: to set the prime goal of human development in harmony with nature, placing the economy and power at its service.

Mr. ADIYA (Workers' delegate, Mongolia) – It is a great honour for me on behalf of the Mongolian Workers' delegation to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to chair the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I am particularly pleased to see the representative of the Workers' group presiding over this historic session when the ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary. I also would like to extend our best wishes and warmest greetings to all delegates present at this session.

Mongolia embarked upon the road of a market-oriented economy from a centrally planned one. The totalitarian regime in Mongolia is over.

It is worthwhile to note that this process of democratization in our country coincides with the moment when the ILO is looking back and forward and when it is striving to increase its role and activities.

But the economic and social situation in Mongolia remains difficult and the living standards of the people have declined. Unemployment and poverty are spreading. Unemployment mostly affects young people who make up more than half of the total population of Mongolia. The Government is unable to change this situation and much remains to be done in this respect.

When one ideology prevailed in my country, Mongolia and its workers' organization could not fully use significant opportunities to cooperate with the ILO. Today a lot has changed since 1990 in my country and thus favourable conditions have been created for cooperation. I am happy to say that in recent years cooperation between the ILO Regional Office for Asia and the Pacific and our organization has successfully developed. I hope that this fruitful cooperation will be further strengthened.

Our workers' organization carries out activities independent of the Government, employers and any political parties. To protect the interests of Mongolian workers our organization initiated tripartite negotiations at the national level. Mongolia ratified the ILO Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), but we regret that recently the Government has submitted a draft law on public employees to Parliament which restricts freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively and to strike. Our organization does not agree with that position and cannot support the adoption of such a law by Parliament.

The Director-General presented to this session an excellent and comprehensive Report which deals with the present and future challenges facing the ILO.

We highly commend the ILO for its important role in promoting social justice and peace in the world. But it is recognized that social injustice is still a widespread phenomenon. In order to eliminate this phenomenon we have to promote better working conditions to ensure every person the opportunity of employment, to respect the right of freedom of association and to develop social dialogue to strengthen tripartism.

Bearing in mind these challenges we fully endorse the view of those speakers who underlined that we must revitalize the noble role of the International Labour Organization to make labour relations more human and strengthen its basic principles and functions.

The Director-General calls on constituents to recommit themselves to the goal of social justice, tripartism and the universality of ILO Conventions.

We welcome the Director-General's invitation and wish every success in his noble endeavour.

Original Russian: Mr. SALIKHOV (Workers' delegate, Tajikistan) – May I sincerely congratulate the President on his election to this high post and express our satisfaction at the fact that a representative of the Workers is leading the work of this anniversary session of the International Labour Conference.

This is the first time our delegation is participating in the work of the International Labour Conference. But we have always been conscious of the ILO's useful and essential influence on all aspects of the social and labour relations in our country.

We are particularly delighted to join in the ILO's activities at a time when it is celebrating its 75th anniversary and is drawing up tactics and a strategy for the future. The Report of the Director-General raises many questions. What kind of an organization should the ILO be at a time when the world is rapidly changing? This question forces all of us to give some serious thought to the question of what should be done in order to maintain our Organization as the "social conscience" of the world.

We can only agree that in the light of the structural changes taking place in all the countries of the world, the ILO is confronted with the problem of adapting its forms and methods of activity. This applies in particular to the standard-setting activities.

Over 75 years the ILO has created a genuine world code of labour legislation. We use ILO standards for guidance when we draft our own national legislations and when we set up tripartite systems for social partnership. It is very difficult for us as a young State creating its own legal system for labour relations to understand the position of those who are trying to weaken the importance of ILO Conventions and to convert them into mere advisory texts which are not binding on governments.

Our State, the Republic of Tajikistan, is a young State. We have to start everything from scratch. For us, the social and labour standards of the ILO are the basis on which we must build the entire legal basis for labour relations.

The situation in our Republic is extremely difficult. The level of production is falling. There is a payments crisis. The level of minimum social guarantees is dropping and conditions of work are deteriorating. The standard of living has fallen sharply. Of particular concern to the trade unions is the irregularity with which wages are paid. This leads to a situation where a large percentage of the workers are simply unable to provide their families with food. They literally fall into abject poverty. The question is not whether they are living above or below the poverty line, but whether they will live at all. Many enterprises are working below capacity or have stopped functioning altogether because of the lack of raw materials and other materials or because their production is not competitive. Unemployment is increasing. We therefore concur with the conclusions of the Report of the Director-General to the effect that the problem of employment is currently one of the most acute problems of our times. We fully support the proposal to submit a yearly report on the economic situation to the International Labour Conference. We believe that, in addition to a thorough analysis of the causes of the economic crisis, a report of this nature should also propose specific proposals for overcoming the crisis. For our young States and particularly for our trade unions, such a report would be of great assistance in our work to protect the interests of the workers.

We endorse the Director-General's position regarding the situation of the countries of our region when he says that their restructuring programmes have been implemented without taking into account their national particularities and the consequences they have on their societies. Our countries are indeed in a "desperate situation". But the situation is far worse than ILO experts can imagine. We cannot share the optimism of the Report when it says that all of these are temporary and transitional difficulties which are very soon going to be overcome.

The defence of human rights is extremely important to us. Indeed, the primary function of the ILO is to ensure observance of these rights, as the Declaration of Philadelphia states that the violation of human rights in any country harms the entire international community.

The trade unions of our republic are doing everything they can as their functions and objectives radically change to ensure their independence from government bodies and political parties and to increase their influence on all government decisions affecting the social and labour rights of workers. At our own initiative, our Parliament adopted an act on trade unions, their rights and guarantees for their activity, and has ensured that unions retain the right of legislative initiative. We actively participated in the adoption of acts on social partnership, collective bargaining and occupational safety. We can state with satisfaction that in all this legislative activity we constantly drew inspiration from ILO standards. We are counting very heavily on the ILO to provide us with its unceasing and productive assistance in the future.

Our trade unions are working in extremely complex and difficult conditions. In a worsening social and political situation, with armed confrontation and interference from certain foreign forces, the trade unions still managed to find their place in the life of our country. They are playing an important and creative role both in strengthening the Government and in protecting the basic interests of the workers.

The Council of the Federation of Trade Unions worked hard to obtain our membership in the International Labour Organization.

We have a great deal of hope for the further extension of ILO activities and the strengthening of its prestige and influence in the world. We are counting on it for effective assistance in solving the difficult and complex problems currently facing the workers of the Republic of Tajikistan.

Ms. MUKADI (Workers' delegate, Indonesia) – On behalf of the Indonesian Workers' delegation and myself, I wish to extend our warmest congratulations to the President on his election at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

Allow me to express also on behalf of the Indonesian Workers' delegation my sincere appreciation of the Report of the Director-General in dealing with a matter of great importance, namely Defending values, promoting change. I am touched by the Director-General's statement: "True, it has not been an orderly retreat and uncertainty reigns in many places; but, all things considered, uncertainty must hold out more hope than the despair caused by an unjust social and economic order."

This year we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization as well as the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia which recapitulates a history of humanism and heroism, when the ILO, in the aftermath of the First World War, emerged to give concrete form and shape to the social conscience of mankind.

There is still great inequality in the world, and new forms of inequality are appearing. The growing poverty in some regions of the world can be explained by increased inequality as well as inadequate growth of output. In others, where poverty has fallen, inequality nevertheless persists. Many countries, such as Bosnia and Herzegovina, are in a "desperate situation", with unemployment out of control and unprecedented poverty. The industrialized world is not immune from mass unemployment, fear of polarization, marginalization and "the growth of an underclass". The plight of millions of displaced persons must not be forgotten. The challenge for the ILO is how to deal with these changes, and "guarantee fair treatment and protection for those who are most vulnerable".

The role of the trade unions today is more vital, and more decisive than ever before in the progress of a country and in the global economy.

Asian workers and, in particular Indonesian workers, are fully aware that we still need more capital, technical know-how, professionalism, skill and experience to be able to play our part. But with your cooperation, combined with our will, courage, hard work, discipline and the natural and manpower resources we have, we are confident that we can meet the challenges ahead and overcome the difficulties.

There are three major challenges currently facing both the world and the ILO:

Firstly, the market economy has become the universally accepted standard. The State is withdrawing from the economic sector and privatization is taking its place around the globe. One of the most difficult problems today for almost all countries, particularly developing countries, is the persistent problem of unemployment. Those of us in developing countries recall with great hope that the Declaration of Philadelphia states that "Poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere" and this remains always the spirit of the ILO's basic task, viz. establishing for mankind a universal and lasting peace based upon social justice. In addition, governments, employers and workers throughout the world should cooperate by putting their greatest efforts into modernizing and developing world economies.

Secondly, the globalization of the economy, the expansion of the world trade in goods and services, international capital movements, including foreign investment, the inter-connection of financial markets, the growing share of multinational enterprises in total economic activity, technical innovations, ecology, the erosion of personal freedom, problems of the developing world and partners in all societies are important problems facing the world today. We would like to appeal to the establishment of the world to put some restraints on technological progress or at least to harmonize it with the progress of mankind as a whole, remembering that the aim of progress is to create a better world for future generations.

Thirdly, the proliferation of social problems. In many cases, the spread of poverty is not simply the result of the generally lower incomes; it is also due to greater inequality. But even in countries where there has been a significant drop in poverty levels, as in Asia, for example, there has been no concomitant improvement in the distribution of income.

We would like to express our congratulations to our brothers and sisters in South Africa. We follow with great interest the new developments and the situation in the country. On the matter of apartheid, it must be acknowledged that women have suffered the most severe forms of discrimination, and that the simple act of abolishing discriminatory laws will not eliminate discrimination against disadvantaged groups and, least of all, against women.

Awareness of the need for equality between men and women is not as developed as that of the need for racial equality, and much remains to be done on both these fronts.

The situation in the Middle East is improving. We sincerely hope that the ILO will be active in dealing with the changes taking place there. As we all know, history has proved that the ILO is an important constructive force in the history of mankind. We have full confidence in its ability to deal with the problems at hand. We maintain our faith in the Organization and look forward to its continued success in achieving social progress and justice in that area with the help of God.

I would naturally like to take this opportunity to reiterate also the Indonesian workers' continuing faith in the work of this international tripartite Organization, and their readiness to cooperate fully in attaining economic growth. Admittedly, not everyone has a share of that economic growth and for those that do, it is often very unfairly distributed.

During more than 75 years of existence, the ILO has done good work on behalf of world labour and has played an important role in safeguarding, defending and promoting the fundamental rights of men and women in achieving social justice. We are confident that the ILO will continue to do so in the years ahead.

Finally, in accordance with the spirit of the International Year of the Family, I am quite sure that Mr. Gray is the right man to chair this session of the Conference. Not only has he been a brave and strong fighter in promoting the interests of workers in general, but he has also supported the case of women workers throughout the world. In keeping with the theme of this session of the Conference, I can affirm that he has spent his life trying to promote change in this world for more social justice in the global economy.

Mrs. CHITAURO (Deputy Minister of Public Service, Labour and Social Welfare, Zimbabwe) – It is indeed a great honour for me to have this opportunity to address the historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. On this momentous occasion, I wish to extend my sincere congratulations on behalf of my delegation to the President of the Conference, Mr. Charles Gray, on his unanimous election, and all the Vice-Presidents and Officers of the Conference, under whose guidance, I have all the confidence, this session of the Conference will meet the expectations of all member States.

At the outset, I wish to extend special congratulations to the delegation of South Africa and, through them, to their democratically elected Government and to their people upon their country's recent entry into the ranks of the ILO after a 30-year hiatus. It indeed gives me great pleasure to note that the vicious system of apartheid has finally been committed to the dustbin of history, for it had, for many decades, laid waste to the social fabric of that country's people. Its giving way to democracy ushers in a new era, not only to South Africa itself but also to the rest of the southern Africa region and to the African continent as a whole, as we endeavour to uplift the political, economic and social well-being of our people within the region. The ILO should now assist the new democracy, upon request, through the provision of requisite expertise and technical assistance so as to redefine the work environment in that country.

At this juncture, I wish to join previous speakers in applauding the Director-General of the ILO for his thought-provoking Report which seeks to transform the ILO in order to fully and effectively implement its mandate. Taking into account the present-day realities of a globalized economy, and the enormous international political changes arising from the demise of the East-West divide, it indeed is imperative that the ILO should seek to assume a new orientation in the discharge of its mandate. In this connection, I welcome the ILO's new active partnership policy with the full hope that this will considerably enhance our efforts in identifying solutions to overcome the challenging scourges of poverty and unemployment, and all member States should take it as an invitation to assess their contributions to the betterment of mankind.

I do realize and concur with previous speakers that the issue of the globalization of the international economy, underscored in the Director-General's Report, affects the projects, institutions and values which contribute to the achievement of our main objective of eradicating economic depravation and social injustice. For us to have lasting international peace and security, there is an absolute need to redirect our energies towards the creation of an enabling and conducive environment in our countries. To this end, there is need to adjust our economic policies to facilitate improved international cooperation. In this same connection, I welcome heartily the successful conclusion of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, seeking to bring down the barriers in international trade; the recent Jobs' Summit convened in the USA; the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment which has just been held at this Conference; and, above all, the World Summit for Social Development, scheduled for next year in Copenhagen. I am hopeful that every effort will be made to address all the socio-economic woes bedeviling mankind today, and that effective and concrete solutions will be identified to enhance and consolidate peoples' standards of living. I do not have the least doubt that the ILO, being in the forefront in the fight against poverty and social inequity, will utilize all its resources to make a meaningful and exacting contribution to the Summit's deliberations.

Zimbabwe highly appreciates the work of the ILO/SAMAT office in Harare, which is making commendable efforts to prioritize our region's labour concerns in order to foster a coordinated regional labour approach to labour issues of common interest. In the light of the envisaged cross-border labour movement, likely to commence and intensify in the wake of the positive and encouraging developments in South Africa and the peace process in train in Mozambique, it is indeed timely that such a coordinated regional approach to labour issues is being pursued. There is no doubt that, as the region delves into closer economic cooperation, labour issues will assume a central role in consolidating political understanding and cohesion. In this context, it is quite appropriate that the ILO should be facilitating the realization of a closer understanding in regional labour relations.

As a country currently implementing an Economic Structural Adjustment Programme, Zimbabwe naturally has tremendous interest in areas such as poverty alleviation, employment, training and occupational health and safety. While our Social Dimensions Adjustment Programme has gone a long way in cushioning the poor and the retrenched from the impact of economic adjustment, its scope and definition still need to be made more comprehensive. We hope to achieve this through the Poverty Alleviation Plan which, as a social safety net, will hopefully adequately address the plight of the socially deprived members of our society. The ILO could significantly assist in this regard through the provision of expertise and technical assistance in line with the goals enunciated in the Director-General's Report.

With regard to labour standards, I am happy to say my Government is already making adjustments and amendments to certain legislation in order to ensure that international labour standards, including those pertaining to the abominable child labour, are defined and discouraged in the workplace. It is my hope that the ILO will continue to assist us in establishing fair labour standards and democracy at work as we pursue the goal of ensuring that all the social partners are party to the legislation that governs the nation.

Today's nations of the world are at the crossroads; we are increasingly becoming aware that no one man is an island, and no country can isolate itself from its neighbour. The impact of the labour force on national economies cannot be ignored. I am happy to note that the ILO provides a unique forum in which all relevant players are able to debate pertinent issues and agree on internationally recognized standards. In pursuing this, we need to exercise caution in determining universal labour standards.

While I sincerely appreciate the need to utilize the ILO in uplifting international standards of living, I also hasten to observe that different countries are at different levels of development. I therefore am of the conviction that, for any standards to be set up and effectively applied by all constituent members, it is of great importance that such standards do take cognisance of the different cultural norms, social traits and traditional values juxtaposed with each country's level of socio-economic development. In this regard, I do find the issue of the proposed "social clause" quite an appealing idea if only it can take into account the factors I have just mentioned.

In the same connection, there is need to clearly define the "social clause", agree on the modalities of its implementation before we can make firm decisions on whether or not to accept it as a labour standard. I believe it is highly desirable that, in our deliberations on this issue, attention should be duly accorded to its potential impact on the fabric of our societies that it and does not impinge on international trade and economic cooperation. The issue, in my view, still requires closer study and analysis with which, hopefully, the Office can sufficiently assist us.

In concluding my remarks, let me emphasize that the ILO constituents should work together at this Conference to further develop the basic principles of the ILO, and utilize their tripartism to forge a closer social partnership through which we can reach and implement meaningful and effective economic decisions for the benefit and betterment of our societies.

Original German: Mr. THÜSING (Employers' delegate, Germany) – May I join in the chorus of congratulations addressed to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election. I am particularly pleased that in this year, which marks such an important event in the history of the ILO, the Conference should benefit from their experience and skilled guidance.

Things have started to move in the ILO, and that is a good thing.

In his Report, the Director-General gives an impressive demonstration of readiness on the part of the Office to play an active role in the discussion on the necessary reforms within the ILO. I welcome that state of affairs, and I should like to thank the Director-General specifically and explicitly for his commitment and for the wealth of ideas reflected in his excellent Report.

However, this wealth of ideas might actually constitute a problem. If I try and visualize how all these proposals and how all these suggestions would work in practice if they were actually implemented, then I can see that we would end up with a completely new, totally different Organization. I recognize that once necessary changes have been identified, they should be resolutely implemented with determination. Nonetheless, I do believe that we must exercise moderation and level-headedness. We do not want a new Organization; we want the old ILO, but better equipped to handle new tasks.

Let me just refer to some of the salient passages in the Report.

As far as standard setting is concerned I have a feeling that people have recognized that our traditional approach was perhaps misguided. We must give up the smug illusion that we can change the world by adopting complex and comprehensive Conventions every year in June in Geneva, which ultimately end up not being ratified. But it would seem that it is proving very difficult for people to draw the only obvious conclusion; namely, that we should confine ourselves to framing fewer standards, but standards which are more readily ratifiable, and use the resources freed as a result of this for increasing practical assistance.

I am inclined to take a somewhat sceptical view of the suggestion that we should fill the void which would result from a reduced level of standard setting by a sort of "soft law". I think that there are still many points which need further clarification. But for the time being I really fail to see the need for the ILO to add such a new "soft law", as it is already able to express its views in an appropriate way on matters within its own competence. Above all I think we should avoid introducing any new rituals which would be practised every year and serve no constructive purpose.

The Report confirms that the Office is perfectly aware of the importance of continuing to provide practical assistance to the countries in Central and Eastern Europe. This must remain a prime concern in the long term. I believe it is particularly important to support the emerging employers' organizations in these countries which are oriented towards the private sector of the economy; and I think here the Office would be well advised to draw on the knowledge and experience of the International Organization of Employers (IOE).

The Director-General rightly emphasizes the weighty, even dramatic, problems which are occurring in the countries undergoing a transition to a market economy. The problems they are facing are not a consequence of privatization; they are a legacy of socialism. And the continuation of this process of privatization is an absolute prerequisite for improved economic and living conditions in these countries. It is no coincidence that it is precisely in those countries where endeavours towards privatization have made the greatest progress, that we see the most positive signs of hope. I think that the Office should pursue this issue of privatization in its activities – and to a far greater degree than is suggested in the Report.

Economies throughout the world have become increasingly interdependent – and this trend is likely to continue. This is bound to have an impact on the work of the ILO; but I do not think that it is basically a new phenomenon. And yet the Report sees this state of affairs, for which the term "globalization" is more of a label than a definition, as a pretext for a thorough and extensive reflection on the future role of the ILO. I think this attitude is too one-sided and somewhat misleading. I should like to comment briefly on this.

I see a danger that the Report could be used to spark off a new wave of hatred against the so-called "multinational enterprises". Surely no one would deny that it is precisely these enterprises that have made a major contribution towards improving social standards, particularly in the developing countries. And, yet, the Report says: "even in the most industrially advanced societies, the rights of workers to information and collective bargaining are time and again being rendered meaningless by sudden unilateral decisions to relocate production". Now, may I ask you, are the multinational works' councils, which are supposed to be set up under the aegis of the ILO, supposed to be keeping tabs on the relocation of enterprises? I am sure that that is not the contribution which the developing countries expect from the ILO.

The Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues will be submitting proposals on a reorganization of their work to the Governing Body. I do not wish to anticipate the proposals which are the fruit of extensive evaluation; but I would point out that in the discussions within the Committee a very different approach is adopted to that in this Report, which suggests that there should be a major reorganization on the way in which the industrial committees should function.

The Report dwells at length on the problem of so-called social clauses. That is fair enough because I think it is only right that the ILO should discuss and determine its position with regard to this very topical issue. But I cannot help noting with some concern that there is a shift in the focus of this discussion. The Report refers to an early draft of the Constitution of the ILO which stated that one of the fundamental objects of international labour Conventions was: "to eliminate unfair competition". I admit that discussions were then taking place in a completely different context; but the objectives and the tasks of the ILO are enshrined in the Preamble to the Constitution – and I can find no reference to competition or trade anywhere in that Preamble. It is therefore all the more surprising to read in the Report that the ILO was conceived, and I quote, "to be an instrument for social regulation of international trade". That is precisely what it is not and should not become.

I do not, at this point, want to enter into a discussion on the pros and cons of these clauses; whether they are likely or not to achieve their commercial or social policy aims, or whether they are going simply to end up being wielded as a protectionist instrument by the strong countries against the weaker ones. What does matter, however, in my opinion, is that the ILO would become involved in trade relations between countries. And, I believe that, any increase in power and importance which would derive for the ILO from this position as a regulatory authority in world trade relations would carry a very high price. The Organization would sustain a loss in moral authority in its quintessentially own area of competence, namely the promotion of social justice.

By all means, let those responsible for trade discuss regulations of world trade; and should they come to the conclusion that certain social clauses would be a good thing – for example on the subject of compliance with the principle of freedom of association – then the ILO could be asked to play a role when cases of violation are identified; but its role should be no greater than that. And certainly, whatever happens, it should not require the introduction of any new monitoring or supervisory mechanisms.

The Report was right to broach this subject of social clauses. But I feel that the outcome of this discussion should be that now the issue is closed as far as the ILO is concerned.

I would like to issue a clear warning. We must be careful not to be tempted, in our commitment to reforms within the ILO and the work of the ILO, to sacrifice what the ILO is and what it is required to remain under the terms of its Constitution; namely a unique association of nations and peoples based on the principles of tripartism and voluntary commitment, whose aim is to contribute to greater social justice. That alone is already a very tall order. And, if we want to try and be more than that, I believe there is a danger that we shall fail to achieve what little we really can manage to do.

Mr. MUKASA (Workers' delegate, Uganda) – First of all, permit me to present my congratulations to the President and the other Officers for having been entrusted with the responsibility of conducting the business of this Conference. Judging from the unchallenged experience of Mr. Gray and the most able manner in which he has conducted the business of this Conference, I have no reason to doubt the successful conclusion of this session.

I would also like to add my voice to those who preceded me in congratulating the Director-General, all ILO member States, and the international community for the successful war against apartheid in South Africa. I further congratulate our brothers and sisters of South Africa for having survived to see the end of the independence struggle in Africa.

Yes, the Director-General's Report has certainly achieved its first objective, and that is by provoking quite a stimulating argument for most of the issues it contains. I am sure the subjects he selected, Defending values, promoting change, will remain issues for discussion by this Conference for some time to come.

I quite agree with the Director-General's reaffirmation of the ILO's established mandate: "to contribute to universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice", and his invitation to constituents to recommit themselves to the goals of social justice, to tripartism, and to adapting the ILO to new challenges. Indeed, these are widely established fundamental values and ideals of the ILO.

Everybody recognizes, with appreciation, the ILO's tireless efforts in the past 75 years in promoting better working conditions, combating all forms of inhuman exploitation of working people, and defending the right of workers to freedom of association, the right to collective bargaining, the right to information and to various forms of technical assistance for the better life of our civil society.

The proposed adaptation to new tasks should not therefore be seen as a waiver to the above-stated objectives upon which the founding members established the ILO.

The stated principle of social justice as one of the ILO's fundamental values, upon which lasting world peace can be established, is based on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). All member countries, and particularly government delegates taking part in celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia, who are at the same time invited to examine the ILO's in-depth review of its future objectives and principles, must recommit themselves to the ratification of at least the three basic instruments, that is to say Convention No. 87, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105).

On this point, I must slightly disagree with the view that so far the falling rates of ratifications are evidence that recently adopted standards are not really widely applicable, and the Director-General's suggestion that more appropriate use of flexibility clauses would be beneficial. This is not true, at least in my humble view.

The falling rates of ratification are mainly due to lack of proper enforcement machinery and the already flexible provisions of the ILO's statute and/or lack of member countries' real commitment to the most celebrated ILO values. The term "simple laws" may not be applicable in our case. The effect of simplifying the law is actually to dilute it and change its original intentions. Laws are intended to be complied with or otherwise; non-compliance is a violation.

I would, with respect, propose that the attainment of the original and future ILO fundamental goals and objectives would require the revision of the ILO Constitution to give this body more power in the enforcement of its standards. It will also require the member countries' seriousness in respecting their own work.

I do commend the Director-General for his continued recognition of tripartism being a highly effective agent for change, as well as a necessary component of real democracy, and his commitment to the task of promoting tripartism through assistance to workers' and employers' organizations and government labour ministries.

I also welcome the Director-General's proposals concerning how the ILO intends to act at a global level to promote employment objectives, but what is important here is actual transformation of the same, and practical results.

I support the suggestion of renaming this Organization the "International Organization for Employment and Labour". This shows the real concern and commitment of this Organization to the maintenance of employment.

Turning to the proposed social clause which has been viewed by some delegates as an attempt to establish a bad precedent to link ILO standard setting to the terms of international trade, I say the reverse is the case. It is already done.

The two Bretton Woods institutions assumed a position of unparalleled importance for most African countries and they now provide the single most important influence on their economic policies. In order to reduce labour costs, increase competitiveness and boost exports, jobs have been lost, terms of employment reduced, hence directly affecting ILO goals. ILO standard setting has been already linked with the terms of world trade.

The review of GATT has appropriately considered the review of environmental protection in the new World Trade Organization, i.e. the protection of animals and forests. What about the protection of civil society?

I am a trade unionist and I do not mind repeating it. In a world where economic power has shifted to international forces which are no longer accountable to government control, particularly in the Third World, and where social justice is constantly threatened by world trading arrangements, we need a global regulation of social rights and an international enforcement of the right of unions to exist, to organize and carry out collective bargaining, and to strike. That is protection of social justice.

Permit me to finally extend my and my organization's (National Organization of Trade Unions) gratitude to all international labour organizations, the ILO, the African-American Labour Center, the ICFTU, LO-Norway, LO-Sweden, the Danish Confederation of Trade Unions, the CTUC, the British TUC, and all International Trade Secretariats for their continued struggle in the protection of our civil society and trade union rights.

I am confident that by the time we celebrate the 100th year of the ILO's existence, the goals to create full employment and full establishment of social justice will have been attained.

Original Spanish: Mr. ESCOLASTICO PINZON (Worker's delegate, Guatemala) – "Commitment, mysticism, solidarity, hope, authenticity, honesty, and coherence should be the permanent values characterizing the institutions and leaders that have the responsibility, challenges and opportunities of seeking alternative solutions to the poverty and social exploitation affecting the majority of countries in the world today."

With these words of introduction, and on behalf of the Workers of Guatemala whom I represent here today, and on behalf of the Guatemalan General Workers' Organization, in particular, I congratulate the President on his election to the presidency. I also address the International Labour Organization and congratulate it on its 75th anniversary of fruitful work in the interest of the workers of the world. The ILO, as we know, is also celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

This moment is opportune to express to the Director-General of the ILO our congratulations on and satisfaction with the subject dealt with in his Report, that is to say Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

The presence of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, his speech and the very interesting work of the ILO Committee of Experts on the occasion of this 81st Session of the Conference, are the best contribution and homage to the 75 years of existence of the ILO. On the eve of the twenty-first century, and in the light of neo-liberal developments which are taking place, the Director-General has made an SOS appeal in his Report to the International Labour Conference.

We agree with the Director-General in the goals which he sets out in his Report because, if there is anything today which is affecting humanity, it is the cynical pragmatism which exists and the critical lack of real values which exist at all levels of society, more particularly, questions relating to moral and ethical values.

As a consequence, the ILO also needs to undergo a process of renovation and redimensioning taking as a starting point the values on which it was founded so as to best be able to continue serving the world, particularly the world's poorest.

In this world, devoid of any sense of solidarity due in particular to the totalitarian effects of structural adjustments, and the market economy which are condemning millions of workers to unemployment and extreme poverty, the Report of the Director-General conjures up for us a sort of oasis when we read: "The future is particularly important for us because it invites us, as it did our founders, to secure the progress of social justice in the world of today and of tomorrow". Knowing the career of the Director-General and his experience, we are sure that these are not just vain words.

However, to pay due tribute to truth, it is necessary to make certain comments on what I consider does not fit well into this concept of social justice. For example, the phrases "Triumph of the market economy", and "the market economy has become the universally accepted standard" are, we consider, disproportionate.

With all due respect and firmness, I declare that, we the workers, refuse to accept this "triumph of the market economy", this savage mercantilism which has been fired by the inflationary processes we see in our countries where the majority of people have no access to basic consumer goods. Prices are tied to the dollar and wages remain frozen.

Here I would like to make reference to my own country, Guatemala, where as a result of structural adjustments, the market economy, state deregulation, service concessions and privatizations, unemployment and the informal economy are growing; poverty and destitution last year affected between 70 and 90 per cent of the population respectively. It is for this and other reasons, that the workers cannot accept the market economy and vehemently reject it as being unjust and callous. The market economy, in practice, contradicts and conflicts with the principles of social justice.

Equally, neo-liberal practices contradict and negate the values of human dignity, freedom, democracy and the general prosperity to which we all aspire.

In our Latin American countries and particularly in Guatemala, the victory of democracy was achieved after 30 years of war and the loss of many thousands of lives. However, we hope that this year we will finally sign and agreement of sound and enduring peace.

I would, therefore, like to draw the attention of the world, and more particularly European nations, which think, incorrectly, that because there are governments that have been democratically elected "our problems will melt away as if by magic".

This is wrong and they are mistaken. These democratic processes are today on the point of collapse and the assassins are: foreign debt, unemployment, abject poverty, violence, drug trafficking, the destruction of the trade union movement in farming, trade, processing and assembling of semi-finisheds, and public employment. Here there is something I must mention: the workers in trade unions are being persecuted by the National Police force and are in fear of their lives.

As regards the globalization of the economy and the social clause, there is urgent need for the trade and industrial agreements which are being signed as a part of economic globalization to be linked to the application of standards, on a tripartite basis, which guarantee recognition of acquired rights.

Of particular importance here are the agro-food sectors and, more specifically, the textile industry because it is here that we have a form of slavery – in many cases, much worse than the slavery of the last century. What is more serious is the subtle and apparently complicit attitude of the Government in not being firm and applying the law and in particular in not protecting workers' human rights. It is also necessary to implement provisions that give protection to working women and children and eliminate abuses and scandalous exploitation. Creating employment in exchange for suppressing rights and institutionalizing slavery should be studied with the greatest attention to rid ourselves once and for all of these vicious policies.

The social clauses should guarantee freedom of association, collective bargaining, etc. laid down in ILO standards.

And we also feel that we have to look at the question of substance rather than form, and I would like to refer to the insinuation of certain interests which would deregulate and make ILO standards and Conventions more flexible.

It is strange, and even an insult to the intelligence of the workers, that on the 75th anniversary of the ILO, in the context of neo-liberalism there is reference to the need to make standards more flexible.

I would like to reiterate here what I said before the Committee on Applications of Standards, that we should recognize the efforts and valuable work of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, in particular, with regard to freedom of association and collective bargaining.

I repeat our best wishes to the ILO on its 75th anniversary and in the face of the veiled intentions to destroy the why and wherefore of the Organization, and certain standards in particular, we declare our solidarity with and belief in tripartism, and see the future prospects of ILO standard-setting activities as a source of great hope, for, as has been said previously, they are the trademark and the backbone of the Organization.

To conclude, and in connection with the recovery of the values necessary to promote change together with social justice in a climate of economic globalization, I would like to refer to a reflection by Pope John Paul II, which is relevant to this issue: "History has shown that a democracy without values is easily converted into visible or disguised totalitarianism".

Original Afghan: Mr. ANWARY (Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Afghanistan) – Permit me first to offer my congratulations, as well as those of the members of my delegation, to the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election to this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish them a very successful session. I am sure the President's expertise will help us to reach success at this session of the Conference.

At the same time, we would like to congratulate all those participating in the Conference on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, and we hope that, encouraged by the importance of these events, the ILO will take a new turn on the basis of objectives laid before this session of the Conference.

I assure you of the complete cooperation of the delegation of the Islamic State of Afghanistan for the successful completion of this Conference.

We, the world's Muslims, understand the need for work and its proper management, because for us it originates from Islam's teachings: it preaches that labour is not only a useful social activity to maintain life, but most of all, labour is a prayer.

The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference is being held at a time of political, economic and social changes faced by all the nations and various international organizations, including the ILO. The achievement of the above-mentioned aims will be easier with the cooperation of all countries and international organizations. We hope that fruitful and effective decisions and steps will be taken at this session of the Conference.

The items on this year's agenda are very important. The Director-General's Report shows the ILO's future objectives. It reviews the plan of action; the activities of this Organization have been extended to include the world's development needs, and are still expanding.

A review of the work of the ILO in the past year shows that this Organization has completed its work successfully in various domains, which has had a positive role in the improvement of working as well as living conditions, the reduction of poverty, an increase in employment, the establishment of democracy and stability in the world of labour.

The technical matters included in the agenda, such as part-time work, safety and health in mines and the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, are most important in the world of labour, and this is why the setting of international labour standards is of such high importance.

As you may be aware, an Islamic State was established in Afghanistan two years ago. Our Islamic State's main objective since then has been to maintain social equality according to the principles of the holy religion of Islam in every economic, social and political field, and to take meaningful steps towards the improvement of people's lives.

The Islamic State of Afghanistan respects and observes the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and wishes to maintain good relations with all the countries of the world. Afghanistan's foreign policy is based on peaceful coexistence, respect for the rights of nations, non-intervention in the internal affairs of other countries and support of the people's legitimate rights.

Unfortunately, owing to the armed conflicts in our country the process of economic and social reconstruction and the fulfilment of basic needs for the improvement of the people's standards of living have been delayed. Serious attempts are being made, with the help of various institutions, to stop the fighting and to bring peace and lasting stability to the country, and these attempts are still continuing. We are sure that as a result the present problems will be solved peacefully in the country.

Of course, the first item on the Government's agenda that will be immediately implemented, once peace prevails, will be the economic and social reconstruction and rehabilitation of the country. It should be mentioned that our country, Afghanistan, is one of the least developed countries, though it possesses an enormous amount of natural and human resources. In addition to the economic and social backwardness of our country, 14 years of imposed war and fighting have inflicted irreparable damage on the economic, social and human areas of the country as a whole. As a result, thousands of schools, residential buildings, services and production units, roads, highways, bridges, vehicles, millions of animals, herds and irrigation, agricultural and communication systems have been either destroyed or very heavily damaged.

The human resources of the country have been severely depleted. Approximately 2 million of our countrymen, who were the main workforce, lost their lives, a large number are disabled, and millions have emigrated to other countries. All this has further complicated the present problems of reconstruction. Due to the spread of such problems and the damage inflicted, the economic reconstruction of Afghanistan is not possible with our internal resources alone. We therefore hope that the nations of the world, the United Nations and the other international organizations, including the ILO, will ease the burden of the people of Afghanistan by offering their financial, vocational and humanitarian assistance.

Our country, Afghanistan, as one of the oldest Members of the ILO, has always paid due respect to the spirit and philosophy of the Constitution of this Organization, and has always supported its actions while trying to apply its principals and decisions, keeping in mind the national needs of the country. At present we are of the opinion that with the establishment of peace and the launching of the programme of the country's reconstruction, there is a need for the ILO to provide further aid and cooperation to Afghanistan. Thus, in our view, putting into practice the principles and articles of the ILO Constitution and its decisions is of the utmost importance in order to establish peace, economic and social progress and stability in the country, while on the other hand, extending vocational, financial, material and professional assistance will play a positive role in achieving peace and fulfilling the objectives of development for the country.

Following the previous aims and requests which we put forward to the ILO, we once again recommend the same: that the competent authorities in the ILO participate actively by designing a specific programme for the reconstruction and the rehabilitation of our country, Afghanistan. When these general needs – needs of the utmost priority: specific budget requirements, vocational and economic cooperation – when these are met, Afghanistan should then be given first priority, as one of the oldest Members of the ILO and a war-torn country, in economic and social assistance.

One of the problems faced by Afghanistan at the national level is that of reconverting the youth of the country from arms and ammunition towards socially useful work, with an income as an incentive. Achieving this goal would give an impetus to the process of peace and stability. In our opinion, one of the ways that would attract the young to productive employment would be to provide workplaces, as well as vocational and technical training. We request the ILO and its member States to provide the necessary assistance by establishing vocational and professional training systems and training centres in Afghanistan.

Teaching and training of professionals, vocational and technical personnel, the provision of a workforce, work for the disabled, vocational training centres, establishing an effective economy in institutions, better management, reforming the administration, implementing self-employment projects and developing human resources – all these are among the fields in which Afghanistan needs most to have urgent assistance from the ILO and its member States.

Original Arabic: Mr. AL KAHLANY (Workers' delegate, Yemen) – I should first like, on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation of the General Federation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Yemen, to extend warm congratulations to Mr. Charles Gray, the President of the Conference, and to his Officers on the confidence shown in their abilities to conduct the proceedings of this Conference. Our meeting and discussions will certainly prove useful and the results that we achieve together through democratic dialogue will have a favourable and productive outcome in terms of renewing the working methods of the International Labour Organization, whose 75th anniversary we are celebrating. It is indeed a great occasion to be meeting here in this pioneering Organization, which has worked unremittingly for human rights and freedom of association and in defence of the joint interests of the social partners, strengthening the lawful rights of each party and consolidating social justice in the world. We are also celebrating the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which added major humanitarian dimensions to the Organization's tasks, so that it stands out among international organizations by virtue of its combative spirit, the positions it adopts and its solidarity, in accordance with the provisions of its Constitution and other instruments and its motivation to widen its horizons and its fields of activity on behalf of the international community.

I draw optimism and hope from the convening of this great Conference in the wake of major world changes that have had a favourable impact internationally on all aspects of democratic, political, economic, social and cultural affairs. The choice of subject for the Director-General's Report this year is apt in terms of the aspirations of the world and the Organization's working methods. It is entitled: Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy and deals with the outlook for the ILO, the far-reaching changes and their implications for the present and the future, the path followed by the Organization in the past few decades, which have strengthened its potential for keeping abreast of international change by virtue of its tripartite structure, the credibility of its goals and its peaceful vision of world social, economic and cultural affairs. It is very appropriate that we should all endeavour at this session to review all the Organization's activities, what it has achieved and how it views the future. This is the key to a successful Conference.

I support the objective and constructive observations and views in the Report and the scientific approach that reflects the Director-General's breadth of vision, his full understanding of his responsibilities and his experience of the working conditions of the Organization. We shall all certainly draw tremendous benefit from the Director-General's vision of the prevailing circumstances, taking into account the recent changes whose implications the Report seeks to address with a view to promoting social development, especially in the developing countries and the countries in transition to a market economy, on the grounds that such development is a sound basis for all the Organization's present and future policies and aspirations and a source of protection against adverse consequences that run counter to such endeavours. We take this opportunity to thank the Director-General for his fine work.

I cannot fail to mention here the important steps towards unity and democracy taken by the Republic of Yemen on 22 May 1990, the day when the blessed Republic of Yemen was established and for the sake of which the Yemeni people have offered up hosts of martyrs in the course of their history. Our country is moving confidently forward towards a new dawn, with a great series of achievements. The eyes of the world were drawn to the experiment of the Yemeni people, who embraced democracy as its path for the future, proclaiming multiparty democracy and policies and guaranteeing human rights and freedom of expression. A referendum was held of all our people – workers, peasants, officials, teachers, students – on the constitution of a united Yemen in a climate of freedom and a spirit of democracy. The first parliamentary elections ever were held in our country and for the first time a National Coalition Government and parliamentary blocs of the ruling parties and the opposition were formed. A body of unified laws was adopted and the country moved confidently towards full development. It opened its doors to investment in accordance with the legislation in force and worked to expand oil prospecting and took action on such vital matters as land and housing in order to put an end to the underdevelopment of the divided past, taking the proper course for our young country in the direction of cultural progress, growth and stability and security for the masses of our devoted people.

Yemeni unity is the fate and destiny of our people and men and women of goodwill had the honour to accord it their support and blessing. Our General Federation highly appreciates the staunch support of the Arab and international working class and of all regional and international trade union organizations for the unity of our Yemeni working class and the unity of the land and people of Yemen. But today our country is the scene of a tragedy caused by a band of separatist renegades made up of some elements of the Socialist Party, so that now more than ever we call on Arab and international trade union organizations and movements to offer support and protection for unity and its achievements.

The General Federation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Yemen therefore appeals to all people of goodwill to align themselves with the just cause and to support it. We call on certain neighbouring States that adopted a resolution in the Security Council against our independent sovereign State, that is to say the States that have aligned themselves with and are supporting the secessionists from the leadership of the Socialist Party, to refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of the Yemeni Republic, since what is happening in our country is an internal matter.

The desire of the General Federation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Yemen to engage in trade union work in our country means that we are always keen to take advantage of the experience of other Arab, regional and international trade union federations in order to promote the role of the Yemeni trade union movement, to cooperate in all trade union matters and to defend freedom of association and human rights everywhere.

I also urge the ILO to take determined action on behalf of the people, workers and employers of Palestine, providing them with material, moral and technical assistance so that they can recover their legitimate rights and build their independent State with its capital in the Holy City of Jerusalem.

We appeal to the ILO and to all international organizations to work for the lifting of the embargoes imposed on the people and workers of Iraq and the Libyan Arab Jamhiriya, which violate humanitarian principles and human rights.

In conclusion, we wish the ILO a successful new era in the service of its humanitarian goals. I should also like to welcome the Sultanate of Oman, South Africa, and the other countries that have recently joined our Organization.

Original Russian: Mr. BAZAROV (Employers' delegate, Tajikistan) – Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, distinguished delegates, may I express my great satisfaction at being allowed the opportunity to take the floor at this highly representative forum.

It is gratifying to see that Tajikistan, as a sovereign State has been recognized and, as an equal member, can join the international community, and as you can see my feeling of pride runneth over as I see the flag of Tajikistan in the midst of the other flags adorning this assembly hall.

I would like to express deep gratitude to all those delegations which have congratulated Tajikistan on becoming a Member of the ILO.

Tajikistan is now experiencing one of the most difficult periods in its evolution. We find ourselves at a historic turning-point, faced with choices that will determine the future of our nation. These choices have to be made at a time of radical political and economic changes, and as we are establishing a secular democratic State based on the rule of law. The road leading to true democracy and progress is a difficult and tortuous one and we are fully cognisant of this and gratefully acknowledge the contribution made by the United Nations and the leader of the mission to Tajikistan, Mr. Bota, in helping us achieve peace and harmony in Tajikistan, and send our delegation to Geneva

At the same time we are deeply convinced that we can muster the strength and are prudent enough to become a worthy member of the international community, given our contribution to world civilization through our national scientists and thinkers, including Omar Khayyam.

This process is to a large extent influenced by temporal considerations. It may drag on for decades if we become insular. It could also be financed and accelerated considerably if timely and useful assistance were to be provided on mutually beneficial terms.

It is truly symbolic that the 75th anniversary of the ILO coincides with the first anniversary of the establishment of the National Association of Small and Medium-sized Enterprises. Our association, as a public organization, has a consolidating function acting as an umbrella organization for Employers' groups. It brings together more than 4,000 units operating in practically every sphere of the national economy.

The timepiece set into motion only one year ago is slowly measuring our pace, as we inexorably move forward, setting the pace of our Association. Qualitative changes in entrepreneurship are sometimes taking place not on a monthly basis but by the day. I would like to mention, among the more noticeable events, the conclusion of a tripartite general agreement with the Government and with the Federation of Trade Unions, the creation of a reference centre to help develop entrepreneurial skills and a fund to provide financial support for small and medium-sized enterprises and establish links between similar associations.

We should nevertheless admit that many problems facing entrepreneurs have not been resolved as yet for subjective and objective reasons. These problems extend to the establishment of tripartite agreements and the social protection of entrepreneurs.

Even though the Government has drafted a support programme for entrepreneurs and a legislative base already exists, the process of economic reform is very slow and the market infrastructure remains poor.

Many problems linked with the development of entrepreneurship are related not only to the instability of the political and social sphere, also to the contradictory nature of laws and regulations. Privatization is progressing painfully. But, without the promotion of genuine owners/entrepreneurs, entrepreneurial skills as a whole cannot develop. How paradoxical it is that the labour market having been forged with minimal participation by entrepreneurial structures, the creation of new jobs without developing entrepreneurship is nigh on impossible.

This is the first time a Tajik delegation is attending a session of the International Labour Conference. Obviously the short time since we became a member of the ILO does not give us the possibility to look into all of its activities in sufficient depth, but there are some comments that I feel I can make on the basis simply of common sense and logic. And as a newcomer, I bring fresh views, unbound by traditions and preconceived ideas. In defence of my opinions, I may refer to the expression, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength".

First of all, the ILO does not react effectively enough to the changes taking place because it is too conservative. This can be observed by examining the processes on the labour markets in the republics of the former USSR which are now independent States. We would like the ILO and its structures to react more effectively and flexibly, providing practical assistance when it is needed. Tajikistan especially requires such help now.

Secondly, there is a need for a better definition of one of the basic principles of the ILO – the principle of social justice Social justice will only have genuine meaning if it applies beyond the confines of a closed system, be it a continent, a country, a branch or a population group. This principle will be a universal value which applies to all mankind only when it is uniformly applied at the international level, in the territory of all the member States of the ILO. If this is not the case, this principle will just be fine words. I would like to give the following example. How can you speak of social justice when the monthly wage of a world-renowned Tajik scientist or professor is hardly enough to pay for one tank full of gas for the family car.

Thirdly, I believe that many of the ideas of the ILO and the values which it supports and preaches would be reflected in practice more quickly if one of the official languages of the ILO was Russian. This is not only because the Russian language is used by people in one-sixth of the world and is spoken by 300 million people, but rather because for historical and practical reasons the Russian language was and still is the language of international communication in the countries of the CIS.

Because the previous system was so closed, the vast majority of our people had no need for fluency in other languages of international communication.

In conclusion may I assure this august assembly, on behalf of Tajik employers, that the National Association of Small and Medium-sized Enterprises will make every effort to give effect to the Recommendations and Conventions of the ILO in our country.

Third report of the Credentials Committee

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Sudan

1. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Sudan submitted by the General Secretariat of Legal Sudan Workers Trade Unions Federation.

2. The objecting organization alleged that the actions of the Government of Sudan, and in particular the introduction of a Trade Unions Act in 1992 violated trade union freedoms and the right to organize, and considered that this view was supported by the conclusions of the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association. In addition, the Government had manipulated its administrative, executive and security bodies to influence the election procedures. The objecting organization appealed for the members of the Workers' delegation to be excluded from the Conference as they had not been selected democratically by the Workers. It also requested the exclusion of the whole Sudanese delegation having regard to the obligations of membership of the International Labour Organization.

3. Communications opposing the objection were received from the Organisation of African Trade Union Unity (OATU) and the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU).

4. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Dominic Casiano Bakheit, Minister of Labour and Administrative Reform and Head of the Delegation to the Conference, stated that the elections under the Trade Unions Act had covered all trade-union levels and had been supervised by neutral committees approved by the trade unions. The general congress of the Sudan Workers Trade Unions' Federation, attended by representatives of the Arab Labour Organization, OATU and ICATU, had democratically elected the Central Committee of the Federation and the three most senior officials, who had now been nominated as Workers' delegate and advisers at the present Conference. The Federation represented the workers in several national and international bodies and had negotiated collective agreements. The Minister concluded that the delegate and advisers had been duly chosen in agreement with the most representative organization of Workers in Sudan and were therefore entitled to participate in the Conference just as they had done in previous years.

5. Having regard to the conclusions of the Committee with respect to objections concerning the Sudan delegation at the two previous sessions of the Conference as well as to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in a recent case relating to Sudan (Case No. 1688 in the 292nd Report), the Credentials Committee still had doubts as to whether the Workers' delegation could be truly representative of the Workers of Sudan. It recalled, however, that its function was to examine whether or not the members of the delegation had been chosen in agreement with the most representative organizations of Workers in the country, if such organizations existed. The objection did not challenge the procedure followed in the nomination of the delegation, did not argue that any other organization should have been regarded as the most representative organization of Workers in Sudan, and was essentially based on allegations relating to the absence of freedom of association in Sudan. The Committee therefore concluded that the objection, as formulated, could not be considered within the framework of its terms of reference.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nicaragua

6. The Committee examined an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Nicaragua submitted jointly by the "Associación de Trabajadores del Campo (ATC)", the "Federación Nacional de Trabajadores de la Salud (FETSALUD)", the "Asociación Nacional de Educadores (ANDEN)" and the "Unión Nacional de Empleados (UNE)".

7. The objecting organizations maintained that the nomination of the Workers' delegate contravened Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution as it had been made for political reasons and not according to the criteria of representativity. Although consultations at the Government's request had taken place jointly with the trade union organizations in the country, since no consensus had been reached the Government should have nominated the Workers' delegation in agreement with the most representative central organizations. As the "Central Sandinista de Trabajadores (CST)" had received the mandate to represent the objecting organizations, the Workers' delegate should have been chosen from the CST. The objecting organizations referred to the fact that the Credentials Committee had on previous occasions confirmed the greater representative character of the CST and the ATC and that since the change of Government in 1990, the Workers' delegate had been nominated from minority central organizations close to the Government, excluding pro-Sandinista organizations, which had been opposed to the social reforms adopted by it.

8. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Francisco Rosales Argüelo, Minister of Labour and Head of the delegation to the Conference stated that the Government had on two occasions invited the seven trade union centres of the country, including the CST and the ATC, to participate in the meeting for the nomination of the Workers' delegate. Since the first meeting had been attended by only two of the centres, the convocation letter for the second meeting stated that that meeting would take place irrespective of the number of centres present. The ATC, the "Central de Trabajadores de Nicaragua (CTN) and the "Central General de Trabajadores independientes (CGTi)" attended the meeting of 9 May, but because there was no consensus, the Minister was given the power to appoint the delegate and advisers on the condition that the delegate came from one of the three centres attending the meeting. With regard to representativity, the CTN, which had been in existence since 1962, had been recognized as representative even by the Sandinista Government when in 1979 its representative had been nominated as Workers' delegate to the 11th Regional Conference of American States of the ILO. Moreover, the CTN met the other criteria of representativity applied in Nicaragua. Since the trade union organizations did not have an obligation to communicate to the Government the number of their members, it was difficult to provide exact data in that respect. On the other hand and as recognized by the objecting organizations, the Government had applied since 1990 a rotation system in the following order: CGTi, CUS, CTNa, CAUS and this year CTN. In those years, the ATC and the CST had been nominated and had participated in the Conference as advisers.

9. The Committee noted that consultations had taken place, even though not all the organizations which had been invited had attended the meetings, including the CST to which the objecting organizations had given a mandate to represent them. It also noted that the meeting had agreed that the Minister would make the nominations subject to certain conditions. At the same time, the Committee recalled that the Credentials Committee last year had advised that the Government should strive to re-examine its consultation procedures, which should be preceded by procedures which would permit the objective evaluation of the importance of the organizations. It considered that the rotation system to which the Government had referred could be an appropriate means of reaching agreement, provided that it was acceptable to the most representative Workers' organizations in Nicaragua. However, in the absence of the necessary statistical data, the means for determining representative character of the various organizations were inevitably inadequate. For the time being therefore, the consultations of the Government, as well as the rotation system for the selection of the titular delegate, should cover all organizations considered to have significant representative character.

10. The Committee accordingly decided not to uphold the objection, but considered that the Government should take the necessary steps to ensure that its evaluation of representativity was essentially based on quantifiable criteria and reliable statistical data.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cameroon

11. The Committee had before it objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Cameroon submitted by the Cameroon Trade Union Congress – Agricultural Workers' Union, the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

12. According to the objections, the members of the delegation belonged to a government controlled group which, with the active support of the authorities, took illegal control of the Confederation of Cameroon Trade Unions (CCTU). The legitimate leadership of the CCTU had been elected in 1992 and had opposed major aspects of Government policy. Claiming that its General Secretary, Mr. Louis Sombes, was engaged in political activities, it engineered his removal, bypassing the disciplinary procedures provided for in the CCTU's Statutes, and installed members of the ruling party, which composed the Workers' delegation. One of them had been installed as General Secretary of the CCTU at a time when the CCTU's premises had been under occupation by armed police officers and Mr. Sombes had been held in prison. The objecting organizations concluded that an unrepresentative group controlling the CCTU had been appointed as Workers' members, violating Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution.

13. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Simon Mbila, Minister of Labour and Social Security, Head of the delegation, indicated that the CCTU was represented at the Conference by its President, Mr. Emanuel Etame Ndede, in accordance with articles 32 and 33 of the statutes and articles 2 and 21 paragraph 5 of the bylaws of the CCTU. The two advisers had, as a result, been nominated in accordance with article 3 paragraph 2 of the ILO Constitution. Moreover, the documents which were annexed to the objection of OATUU and the ICFTU relating to Mr. Louis Sombes could bind the Government neither in form nor in substance. The Government had ratified Convention No. 87 in 1960 in respect of which no violation had been registered, and the allegations of Mr. Louis Sombes and those representing him were devoid of merit. In addition, it had never interfered in the internal affairs of the CCTU.

14. At the Committee's request, the Minister also attended the Committee. He was accompanied by two members of the Government delegation: Ms. Claire Nyangang, Director of Labour, and Mr. Herman Misse, Inspector General No. 1 in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The Minister provided information concerning specific incidents alleged by Mr. Sombes and confirmed the Government's denial of their truth. He said that the nomination of the Workers' delegation had been made on the basis of the list submitted to him by the President of the CCTU who, in accordance with its basic instruments, represented the CCTU in such matters. He stressed that the Government had not interfered in any way in the running of the CCTU, including the replacement of Mr. Sombes as General Secretary of the CCTU. The problems that had arisen were solely internal ones for the CCTU to resolve.

15. At the Minister's suggestion, the Committee heard the persons appointed as advisers to the Workers' delegate (the latter being ill), Ms. Salomé Tsogo, Vice-President of the CCTU, and Mr. André Mousseni, the new General Secretary. It also received Mr. Guy Ryder, a representative of the General Secretary of the ICFTU, and Mr. Louis Sombes.

16. After obtaining detailed oral and written information, the Committee was satisfied that the matters set out in the objections were essentially internal to the CCTU and in any event fell outside the Committee's terms of reference, being questions for decision by the national courts or possibly for the Committee on Freedom of Association of the ILO. It therefore decided not to uphold the objections.

17. At the same time, the Committee felt that the procedure for the nomination of the Workers' delegation in this case based as it was on a list provided by an official of the CCTU, should have been more thorough and transparent so as to leave no doubt as to whether the requirements of Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution had been satisfied.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Malaysia

18. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Malaysia submitted by the Malaysian Trades Union Congress (MTUC), under the signature of two persons whom the Government had appointed as advisers to the Workers' delegate. The Committee also had an objection from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) supporting MTUC's objection and alleging the possibility of action by the Government against MTUC on account of the objection.

19. The objecting organizations requested invalidation of the nomination of Mr. Mat Jid Mohamed, President of the Congress of Unions of Employees in the Public and Civil Service (CUEPACS) as Workers' delegate, claiming that the nomination had been made without the agreement of MTUC, which had been recognized by the Government itself as the most representative organization of Workers in Malaysia. MTUC represented about 55% of organized labour and CUEPACS only 13%. Of the 409 trade unions, 147 were affiliated to MTUC, whereas CUEPACS had a total of about 50 active unions. While MTUC represented workers in all sectors of the economy, CUEPACS was limited to the public and civil service and to a smaller geographical area. Following the objection lodged by MTUC in 1982, when it had for the first time been replaced by CUEPACS, as the organization to which the Workers' delegate belonged, the Credentials Committee had concluded that MTUC was still the most representative Workers' organization. In its objection, MTUC denied that it had ever agreed with CUEPACS that the Workers' delegate should be nominated on the basis of rotation, and it annexed supporting evidence.

20. MTUC also stated that the signatories of the objection had declined to act as advisers to the Workers' delegate; copies of letters to that effect, one of which was addressed to the Director-General of the ILO, were annexed to the objection.

21. Communications opposing the objection were received from CUEPACS and the Malaysian Labour Organization (MLO).

22. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Dato' Lim Ah Lek, Minister of Human Resources and Head of the delegation to the Conference, stated that the appointment as Workers' delegate of the President of CUEPACS was in accord with a rotation system that had been applied since 1982 and under which MTUC had alternated with CUEPACS in proposing the Workers' delegate. MTUC had challenged the appointment of CUEPACS in 1984 and in 1992, but had subsequently withdrawn its objection, indicating acceptance of the rotation system. CUEPACS had insisted that an agreement for rotation had been reached following a Declaration of Intent signed on behalf of MTUC and CUEPACS in 1982. MTUC had, however, never attempted to negotiate with CUEPACS but had insisted on nomination at the present session. After trying to help the organizations resolve their differences, the Government had decided to maintain the rotation system. The Minister's communication gave statistical information which, while not fully confirming the claims of MTUC, showed that the latter had a slightly larger number of affiliates than the two other representative trade union centres together (CUEPACS and the MLO) and a larger number of members than the combined total of the other centres. Finally, the Minister noted that in 1992 the Committee had not upheld an objection by MTUC to a Workers' adviser.

23. Concerning the signatories of the objection by MTUC, the Minister pointed out that they had been nominated as advisers to the Workers' delegate in accordance with the rotation system and one of them had been informed that an air ticket and subsistence allowance were available.

24. The Committee, noting that the signatories of the objection by MTUC had clearly declined to act as advisers, had not accepted or had not been offered travel or subsistence payments from the Government and had not registered in the Workers' delegation of Malaysia, concluded that they could not be considered as "serving as adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken", within the meaning of Article 26, paragraph 4(c) of the Conference Standing Orders. Their objection was therefore found receivable.

25. Before reaching conclusions on the substance of the objections, the Committee heard the President of MTUC, Mr. Zainal Rampak, at his request. It subsequently heard representatives of the Government, Mr. Dato Anthony Yeo, Secretary-General of the Ministry of Human Resources and Government delegate to the Conference, and Mr. Mohamad Sauffee, Labour Attaché in Geneva. After an exchange of views on the issues raised in the case, the Committee invited the Government to remove the names of the signatories of the objection from MTUC as advisers to the Workers' delegate. The Government representative explained that this was not possible as they had properly been appointed in accordance with a rotation scheme which was still in force and which was a fair system for ensuring that the central trade union organizations each had a chance of taking part in the International Labour Conference. Considering that persons could not validly be regarded as advisers if they had declined to act in that capacity, the Committee concluded that the two signatories of the MTUC objection should not appear as members of the Workers' delegation of Malaysia in the List of delegations.

26. On the substance of the objections, the Committee considered that, although governments had a greater discretion when appointing advisers in order to increase the representativity of a non-governmental delegation, the delegate must be chosen in agreement with the most representative organizations. It was not in dispute that MTUC was the most representative Workers' organization in Malaysia. As the Committee had noted on many previous occasions, a rotation system could be a useful means of obtaining agreement between the most representative organizations in a country, but it should in no case be imposed by the Government. The Committee could find no evidence – in the 1982 Declaration of Intent, referred to in the Minister's communication, or in the other documentation submitted – that MTUC had agreed to the rotation system. The Committee noted, however, that MTUC appeared to have acquiesced in the rotation scheme from 1982 until 1992. In connection with the objection that MTUC had lodged in 1992, the Credentials Committee had recalled that governments should always try in so far as is possible to obtain the agreement of the most representative Workers' organizations. The Committee considered however that, in the present case, the Government had taken insufficient action to obtain such agreement, and had then continued to apply a rotation system which MTUC had clearly made known it was no longer prepared to cooperate in. While the Committee did not wish to recommend invalidation of the credentials at the present time, it stressed the need for the Government in future to adopt other means with the aim of ensuring – through bona fide discussions between the parties concerned – that the Workers' delegate is chosen in agreement with the most representative organizations of Workers in Malaysia.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' advisers of Lebanon

27. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of two advisers to the Workers' delegate of Lebanon, submitted by the "Confédération générale du Travail au Liban (CGTL)" signed by the Workers' delegate and one of his substitutes.

28. The objecting organization maintained that it had not been consulted on the nominations and that one of the two advisers held no trade union function. In addition, the Government had refused to cover the travel and subsistence expenses of the Workers' delegate, substitute delegates and advisers. It requested the deletion of the names of the two advisers and the payment of expenses of the Workers' delegation.

29. After the objection had been communicated to the Government, two representatives of the Government informed the Secretary-General of the Conference on 17 June 1994 that the two persons in question, Mr. Antoine Bechara and Mr. Habib Zeidan, were not included in the Workers' delegation.

30. The Committee noted that the List of delegations would be amended as a consequence and concluded that the objection was now without object.

31. Concerning the allegation of non-payment of expenses, the Committee drew attention to paragraph 16 of its First Report in which it recalled the obligation of Members under article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of delegates and advisers. The Committee considered that compliance with the above-mentioned provision was essential in order to ensure full respect for tripartism.

32. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Resolutions

Report of the Resolutions Committee

1. The Resolutions Committee, set up by the Conference at its First Sitting on 7 June 1994, was originally composed of 157 voting members (76 Government members, 31 Employers' members and 50 Workers' members). An appropriate weighting system ensured equality of voting strength.

2. The Committee was first moved to elect its officers. On the proposal of Ms. Moehario (Government member, Indonesia) speaking on behalf of the Asian countries, seconded by Mr. Castle (Employers' member, United Kingdom) and Mr. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland), Mr. Gopalan (Government member, India) was elected to the Chair. In accordance with the Committee's usual practice, the Chairperson was also elected Reporter. The Committee elected as Vice-Chairpersons Mr. Castle (Employers' member, United Kingdom) and Mr. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland).

3. The Committee had before it ten resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. All ten resolutions were considered receivable in accordance with article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders.

4. The resolutions were then introduced by one of their authors in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders and in the following order: (a) resolution concerning the need to harmonize and improve ILO informatics systems for optimal utilization and accessibility by all States; (b) resolution concerning the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization; (c) resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation; (d) resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the promotion of international labour law; (e) resolution concerning ILO action in preparation for the World Summit for Social Development; (f) resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism and the universal application of fundamental rights in the face of enterprise networks and economic interdependence; (g) resolution calling upon the ILO to resist the introduction of the social clause in international trade and to review ILO standards; (h) resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development; (i) resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO; (j) resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour.

5. After the introduction of the resolutions and before the vote held in accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders, the following two resolutions were combined by their authors:

the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Ms. Aerenlund (Denmark); Mr. Blondel (France); Mr. Brett (United Kingdom); Ms. Buverud Pedersen (Norway); Mr. Doucouré (Mali); Mr. Douglas (New Zealand); Mr. Edström (Sweden); Ms. Engelen-Kefer (Germany); Mr. Falbr (Czech Republic); Mr. Gray (United States); Mr. Itoh (Japan); Mr. Lettieri (Italy); Mr. Maitland (Australia); Mr. Mendoza (Philippines); Mr. Mukasa (Uganda); Mr. Parrot (Canada); Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico); Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe); Mr. Tapiola (Finland); Ms. Van de Burg (Netherlands); and Mr. Verzetnitsch (Austria); the following Workers' delegates, whose credentials arrived late, also associated themselves with this resolution: Mr. Agyei (Ghana); Mr. Ahmed (Pakistan); and Mr. Trotman (Barbados); and the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the promotion of international labour law, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Mr. Ba (Burkina Faso); Mr. Melgarejo (Uruguay); Mr. Ould Brahim (Mauritania); and Mr. Peirens (Belgium). The merged text was entitled Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

6. The following two resolutions were also combined by their authors: the resolution concerning ILO action in preparation for the World Summit for Social Development, submitted by the following Workers' delegates: Mr. Ba (Burkina Faso); Mr. Melgarejo (Uruguay); Mr. Ould Brahim (Mauritania); and Mr. Peirens (Belgium); and the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development, submitted by the following Workers' delagates: Ms. Aerenlund (Denmark); Mr. Blondel (France); Mr. Brett (United Kingdom); Ms. Buverud Pedersen (Norway); Mr. Doucouré (Mali); Mr. Douglas (New Zealand); Mr. Edström (Sweden); Ms. Engelen-Kefer (Germany); Mr. Falbr (Czech Republic); Mr. Gray (United States); Mr. Itoh (Japan); Mr. Krzaklewski (Poland); Mr. Lettieri (Italy); Mr. Maitland (Australia); Mr. Mendoza (Philippines); Mr. Mukasa (Uganda); Mr. Parrot (Canada); Mr. Sánchez Madariaga (Mexico); Mr. Sibanda (Zimbabwe); Mr. Sundaram (Sri Lanka); Mr. Tapiola (Finland); Ms. Van de Burg (Netherlands); and Mr. Verzetnitsch (Austria); the following Workers' delegates, whose credentials arrived late, also associated themselves with this resolution: Mr. Agyei (Ghana); Mr. Ahmed (Pakistan); Mr. Ben Seddik (Morocco); and Mr. Mayaki (Niger); the merged text was entitled Resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development.

7. In accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5(a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference and using the traditional system of balloting, the Committee convened at its second sitting to determine the first five resolutions to be considered among the eight remaining before the Committee and their order of priority. Before the ballot, in the name of the Employers' members, Mr. Castle (Employers' member, United Kingdom) withdrew the resolution concerning the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, submitted by the Employers' delegates; likewise, in the name of the Workers' members, Mr. Tapiola (Workers' member, Finland) withdrew the resolution (merged text) concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO, submitted by the Workers' delegates. The Government member of Canada thanked the two groups for withdrawing these two resolutions and assured them of his support in helping achieve consensus on the remaining resolutions.

8. Owing to a change in the composition of the Committee, there were at the time of voting 179 voting members (88 Government members with 969 votes each; 34 Employers' members with 2,508 votes each; and 57 Workers' members with 1,496 votes each).[1]

9. The first five resolutions and the votes cast for them were as follows:

(1) The 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation: 949,784 (weighted votes);

(2) The World Summit for Social Development: 718,831 (weighted votes);

(3) The role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour: 573,324 (weighted votes);

(4) Resolution calling upon the ILO to resist the introduction of the social clause in international trade and to review ILO standards: 540,206 (weighted votes);

(5) Need to harmonize and improve ILO informatics systems for optimal utilization and accessibility by all States: 502,509 (weighted votes).

10. With only six resolutions, there was no need for the Committee to set up a Working Party to make recommendations as to the ordering of the remaining resolutions.

Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation

Presentation of the resolution

11. In presenting the resolution, the Government member of Canada remarked that originally no fewer than four resolutions had been tabled on this subject. He and the other co-sponsors of the present resolution believed that the time and place to raise controversial ideas was not in the Resolutions Committee, and especially not in a resolution on the 75th anniversary of the ILO. Such issues were being addressed in the plenary in the context of the Report of the Director-General and the purpose of the resolution was to ensure that there would be an opportunity to discuss them in the Governing Body or in a future Conference. He concluded by inviting all members to consider giving highest priority to this resolution.

General discussion

12. The Government member of Italy expressed support for the resolution, recalling his delegation's approval of measures proposed by the Director-General and adopted by the Governing Body to make ILO's structures more streamlined and effective. He noted with pleasure the further proposals contained in the Director-General's report to the Conference.

[1] Subsequently, further changes were made in the composition:
Third sitting on 11.6.94, 175 voting members (88 G, 34 E and 53 W);
Fifth sitting on 14.6.94, 167 voting members (90 G, 33 E and 44 W);
Sixth sitting on 15.6.94, 165 voting members (90 G, 31 E and 44 W);
Seventh sitting on 16.6.94, 158 voting members (90 G, 29 E and 39 W);
Eighth sitting on 17.6.94, 155 voting members (90 G, 29 E and 36 W);
Tenth sitting on 18.6.94, 154 voting members (90 G, 29 E and 35 W).

13. Expressing her satisfaction with the result of the ballot, the Government member of the United Kingdom expressed strong support for the resolution. Her Government approved of recent reforms to modernize the International Labour Organization and felt that the process should continue. A wide range of views on the subject was being discussed in the plenary and it was not for the Resolutions Committee to anticipate the result of the debate. She had no amendments to propose and hoped that amendments from other members would be neither too numerous nor too detailed.

14. The Government member of Malaysia congratulated the sponsors of the resolutions that had been placed first, second and third in the ballot and thanked all those who had voted the ASEAN resolution into fourth place. He noted that the resolution under discussion requested the Governing Body to examine the ideas and proposals of the Director-General. Among these issues, he continued, were the rigidity of international labour standards and the question of the social clause and international trade. On a point of order, the Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the issues referred to by the speaker were not mentioned in the resolution. The Chairman concurred and reminded the Government member of Malaysia that he had asked for the floor to speak on the resolution. The latter, while taking the view that the subjects he had mentioned were related to the future orientation of the ILO and the Report of the Director-General as referred to in the resolution, said that he would reserve his comments for a later stage in the discussion.

15. The Government member of Mexico felt that the subject of the resolution was also the basic subject of the Conference. While she agreed with the general thrust of the resolution, it was her Government's view that essential characteristics of the ILO such as tripartism and the application of standards had to feature in some way in the text. She intended to formulate amendments accordingly, in consultation with the sponsors of the resolution.

16. The Government member of Cuba expressed support for the resolution, but noted that certain issues needed to be further elaborated. His Government recognized that changes were needed in the ILO and it wanted the Organization to become more dynamic. He intended to propose certain amendments to the resolution.

17. As a co-author of the resolution, the Government member of Germany felt that he did not have a lot to add. The resolution welcomed the proposals contained in the report of the Director-General: although not all of equal weight, these formed a good basis for further discussion. That report covered all the important issues with which the ILO was currently concerned, including employment, standard setting, and the link between standards and international trade. He expressed his delegation's readiness to provide further clarification in order to obtain full support from all three benches for the resolution.

18. The Government member of Argentina expressed satisfaction with the result of the ballot. The importance of the resolution under discussion was indicated by the fact that other texts on the same subject had been tabled by Employers' and Workers' members. He hoped that agreement on the resolution could be reached as quickly as possible.

19. The Government member of Nicaragua noted that the resolution was on the whole rather bland. On the other hand, the Report of the Director-General did cover issues such as the resolution of economic conflicts which raised a number of important legal questions. He agreed with the Government member of Mexico that certain aspects of the resolution required more serious thought and expressed readiness to work together with her on appropriate amendments.

20. The Government member of China supported the resolution for two main reasons: it reflected the concern of the ILO's constituents to make it better adapted to the changing world environment, and its operative part was both reasonable and clear. The resolution in no way prejudged the results of the review of the Organization's activities and would, he believed, command a broad consensus. Finally he announced that he might have some amendments to propose.

21. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group felt that the 75th anniversary was an appropriate milestone for the ILO to review its activities in order to ensure that they remained relevant and that its structures and methods were still appropriate. Views on these matters were being expressed, sometimes forcibly, in the plenary. He was pleased to note that the resolution, like that which had initially been tabled by the Employers, was concerned with the follow-up to that debate. His group would have no amendments to propose to facilitate and speed up the progress of the work of the Committee.

22. The Government member of Sudan, referring to the values and objectives of the ILO and its fundamental concern with social justice, reminded the Committee of the plight of nations in which poverty was widespread. The 75th anniversary was an appropriate time to remember the suffering which this caused and to strengthen the ILO and the assistance which it can provide to such countries. He fully supported the resolution.

23. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed his group's view that a resolution which simply wished the Organization well on its 75th anniversary was not sufficient. Even the text initially proposed by the Employers had, he thought, more substance to it. Nevertheless, the resolution had good potential. His group recognized that it was more procedural than substantive in nature, but wished to see some real issues mentioned. He outlined some principles and relevant facts that could figure in the preamble and announced the intention of the Worker members to propose a limited number of amendments. He looked forward to a sensible and creative discussion.

24. The Government member of the Russian Federation expressed support for the resolution and underlined its importance both as a reaffirmation of the values on which the ILO was based and as a recognition of the need to improve the work of the Organization. Improvements had already been introduced, but these efforts had to be pursued vigorously, in particular by paying greater attention to the problems of economic transition in Eastern Europe.

25. The Workers' member of India recalled that his country was a founder member of the ILO and was happy to participate in the 75th anniversary. As regards the Organization's future orientation referred to in the resolution, it was vital to discuss unemployment as a global problem and its relationship to structural adjustment. He proposed that, in order to respond to the expectations of the working class throughout the world, the ILO should organize a special session to examine this subject.

26. Recalling that the main aim was to adopt a resolution which enjoyed the widest possible support, the Government member of Egypt welcomed the resolution as being both simple and effective and thanked the Employers' members for having withdrawn their own text. He felt, however, that it would be useful if the resolution highlighted certain aspects on which there was general agreement and identified others on which more progress could be made. He announced that he might therefore have some limited amendments to propose.

Consideration of amendments

27. Forty-one amendments, numbered D.5 to D.45, were submitted for examination.

Amendments to the preamble

28. Amendment D.34, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to delete from the title of the resolution the words "and its future orientation".

29. Introducing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairman recalled that the resolution had been presented as essentially procedural and that the proposed change in title reflected the idea expressed by the sponsors of the draft that the resolution should not prejudge any decisions on matters of substance.

30. The Government member of Canada, speaking on behalf of the authors of the resolution, indicated that he could accept the amendment, but various other Government members preferred to retain the existing title. Amendment D.34 was consequently withdrawn.

31. Amendment D.5, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to add at the end of paragraph 1 the words "and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia". The Government member of Mexico introduced the amendment which was accepted by the Government member of Canada. Amendment D.5 was adopted.

32. Amendment D.27, submitted by the Government members of India and Tunisia, sought to delete from paragraph 1 the words "milestone of the". Introducing the amendment the Government member of India explained that it was purely a matter of drafting. The Government member of Canada and the Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated their acceptance of the amendment. Amendment D.27 was adopted.

33. Amendment D.6, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to add, after paragraph 1, a new paragraph 2 worded as follows:

> Reaffirming that the tripartite structure of the ILO's constituency, its principles and purposes, signify that the Organization has a special role to play within the UN system,

34. After the amendment was introduced by the Government member of Mexico, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed a subamendment worded as follows:

> Reaffirming that, because of its principles, mandate and tripartite structure, the ILO has a unique role to play within the UN system.

35. The Government member of Canada indicated that he favoured the subamendment, but the Government member of Spain pointed out that the word "principles" featured already in paragraph 2 and was thus an unnecessary repetition.

36. The Employers' Vice-Chairman had no objection to the proposed wording, but proposed that the text should be placed not before but after the existing paragraph 2.

37. The Workers' Vice-Chairman accepted that the word "principles" should be omitted and expressed his agreement with the Employers' Vice-Chairman concerning the location of the proposed text. He further proposed to add the word "also" after "Reaffirming".

38. The Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua both indicated that they accepted the subamendment as reformulated by the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen. Amendment D.6, as subamended, was adopted.

39. Amendment D.8, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to add to paragraph 2 after "Reaffirming" the words "that within that scope, the promotion of social justice, as the basis of universal peace, is an intrinsic part of".

40. Following the introduction of the amendment by the Government member of Mexico, the Employers' Vice-Chairman sought clarification as to what the words "within that scope" referred.

41. The Government member of Mexico explained that the amendment had involved a reordering of paragraphs, but if the existing order were retained the words mentioned by the Employers' Vice-Chairman could easily be omitted.

42. A long discussion ensued in which various Government members expressed reservations about the wording of the amendment as well as about the proposal to reorder the paragraphs. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a subamendment either to omit the reference to social justice and universal peace altogether or to add at the end of paragraph 2 the words "including the promotion of social justice as the basis of universal peace".

43. After some discussion, the second of the alternative subamendments proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom was agreed upon.

44. The Government member of Canada proposed a further subamendment to retain the existing ordering of the paragraphs, a proposal which was supported by the Government member of Mexico.

45. Amendment D.8, as subamended by the Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom, was adopted.

46. Amendment D.35, submitted by the Workers' group, was withdrawn by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, in view of the decision to retain the existing order of the paragraphs.

47. Amendment D.7, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to add, after paragraph 2, a new paragraph worded as follows:

> Stressing the necessity for the continued enhancement of working conditions and better life for workers,

48. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated his group's opposition to the inclusion of the new text proposed.

49. The Government member of Canada felt that the mandate of the ILO did not have to be spelled out and that the amendment did not have its place in the resolution. He was supported by the Government member of the United Kingdom who, while agreeing with the sentiment of the amendment, pointed out that the text would become excessively long if such issues were introduced.

50. The Government member of Nicaragua spoke in support of the amendment, referring to the adverse effects which deregulation and liberalization were having on working conditions.

51. The Government member of Norway called for a vote, but the Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested instead that amendment D.7 be withdrawn, on the understanding that a similar text might be proposed at a later stage as a subamendment to amendment D.39.

52. The Government member of Mexico agreed to withdraw amendment D.7 in order to accelerate the Committee's work. The Government member of Malaysia requested that the withdrawal of this amendment should not be regarded as in any way prejudging the Committee's decisions on other amendments seeking to introduce new issues into the resolution.

53. Amendment D.33, submitted by the Government members of India and Tunisia, sought to replace in paragraph 3 the words "anticipating that these will continue" with the words "that these changes will have impacts of different nature and intensity on the entrepreneurial and working classes in the developing countries".

54. In introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia took the view that it was a question of form rather than of substance and that it was more important to refer to the impact of the changes than simply to say that they would continue.

55. The Government member of Canada accepted that the changes did have an impact on entrepreneurs and workers but noted that the original text had focused on the effect of the changes on the ILO. He thus opposed the amendment as it changed the meaning of the paragraph. The Employers' Vice-Chairman supported the Government member of Canada.

56. A long discussion ensued in which the Government member of India explained that it was important to recognize the different impact that social and economic changes were having on developing countries and referred in the connection to paragraph 3 of Article 19 of the ILO Constitution. He was subsequently supported by a number of other Government members.

57. In order to find a wording acceptable to all sides, a number of subamendments were proposed. After a recess, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed, as a subamendment, to retain the existing text of paragraph 3 and to add the words "and will have varying effects on different countries". Amendment D.33, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

58. Amendment D.9, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to add in paragraph 4 after the word "considering" the word "also" and to add after the words "from time to time" the words "in order to be strengthened and therefore".

59. Following the introduction of the amendment by the Government member of Mexico, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the addition of "also" was of no consequence, but that the second part of the amendment was quite another matter, as it implied that all institutions and structures should be strengthened, before even reviewing them.

60. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested in response to the previous speaker's concern the addition of the words "if necessary". The Employers' Vice-Chairman accordingly proposed a subamendment to add after the words "from time to time" the words "and, where necessary, strengthened". The Government member of Mexico indicated her agreement with the subamendment. Amendment D.9, as subamended, was adopted.

61. As a result, amendment D.36, submitted by the Workers' group, fell.

62. Amendment D.37, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to add after paragraph 4 the following new paragraph:

> Recognizing the key importance of ILO Conventions covering fundamental workers' rights, in particular Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 29 and 105, 111 and 138,

63. Introducing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairman underlined the importance of the text proposed which concerned ILO Conventions dealing with fundamental human rights. The Government member of Canada accepted the wording of the amendment but proposed that it should come before paragraph 3, rather than after paragraph 4, in order to respect the logical progression of the text, as conceived by its authors.

64. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, however, said that he was unaware that there were any key ILO Conventions and expressed the view that there were others which were also very important. The Government member of Mexico pointed out that in fact the proposed text recognized the key importance of ILO conventions bearing on the fundamental rights of workers. The Government member of Nicaragua agreed with the previous speaker, but wondered whether it might not be preferable to refer to ILO Conventions in general, as they all became part of national law once ratified. The Government members of France and the United Kingdom, however, both underlined the special importance of the Conventions referred to in the amendment and suggested respectively that the word "notably" might replace the words "in particular" and that the word "key" might be omitted.

65. The Employers' Vice-Chairman requested a break for consultations, following which the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed the following subamendment:

> Noting the particular importance of ILO Conventions covering fundamental rights, including Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 29, 105 and 111, which was supported by the Employers' Vice-Chairman. The Government member of Canada proposed a second subamendment to place the new paragraph just before paragraph 3. Amendment D.37, as subamended, was adopted.

66. Amendment D.38, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to add after paragraph 4 a new paragraph worded as follows:

> Mindful of the fact that challenges of globalization and especially the relationship between workers' rights and international trade will continue to be dealt with by the ILO,

67. The Workers' Vice-Chairman introduced the amendment, stressing its importance in the light of the Workers' group's decision to withdraw its resolution on this subject.

68. The Government member of Malaysia, speaking on behalf of the ASEAN countries and a number of other developing countries, indicated that the amendment could not be accepted. He stated that the ILO's mandate extended only to workers' rights and not to international trade and there was already a supervisory mechanism in the Committee on the Application of Standards to look into improvements in labour standards and their effective application. He was of the opinion that workers' rights and international trade should not be linked since to do so would be tantamount to imposing a new conditionality by denying market access and placing greater obstacles in the way of the economic development of the developing countries which were facing unemployment, poverty and structural adjustment problems. He acknowledged that those who were in favour of linkage were genuinely concerned about workers' rights, but what was most important was to create jobs and increase productivity. If the effect of a linkage or social clause was to push labour costs up to the levels prevalent in industrialized countries, then this would erode whatever comparative advantage the developing countries enjoyed and affect their capacity to sustain economic development and improve living standards.

69. The Workers' Vice-Chairman raised a point of order, arguing that the previous speaker had just made a presentation of the resolution which had been placed fourth in the ballot, instead of speaking on the amendment. In response, the Government member of Malaysia observed that he had simply been explaining why he could not agree to the amendment.

70. The Government member of Canada feared that, with the amendment under discussion, the Committee was entering a minefield. The link between workers' rights and international trade needed above all to be clarified and the original text of the resolution proposed, without referring to it specifically, that issues such as this be placed in the hands of the Governing Body. He therefore appealed to the sponsors of the amendment and to those of amendments D.40, D.18, D.21, D.22 and D.24 which addressed the same subject, to withdraw them.

71. The Government member of Bangladesh fully endorsed the views expressed by the Government member of Malaysia and noted that the problems which he had mentioned were even more acute in the case of the least developed countries, such as his own.

72. The Government member of Mexico asked if the Workers' group might accept a subamendment deleting the reference in their amendment to the relationship between workers' rights and international trade.

73. As a co-sponsor of the resolution, the Government member of Sweden stressed the universality and neutrality which characterized the original text and which would be undermined by amendments either for or against the social clause.

74. The Government members of India and China fully endorsed the statement of the Government member of Malaysia. The former noted that there was general agreement that the issue would be taken up by the Governing Body; this was not the time or place to deal with it. The latter added that the phrase "continue to be dealt with by the ILO" used by the authors of the amendment wrongly assumed that this was the present practice. He concluded that the amendment was about the social clause and was inappropriate in the context of the resolution under discussion.

75. The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group might consider a possible mutual withdrawal of the amendments as suggested by the Government member of Canada and of the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Mexico. However, so far the sponsors of amendments D.18, D.21, D.22 and D.24 had not reacted to the suggestion of withdrawing their amendments. He requested a brief break for consultations.

76. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted the slow progress being made by the Committee in its consideration of the amendments and appealed either for mutual withdrawal of the relevant amendments or for agreement on a rewording of the amendment acceptable to all sides. Her own Government was not in favour of linking international trade to workers' rights. She concluded by noting that even if a statement on the social clause was adopted, this would make no difference in practice, as decisions on the matter would in any case be taken elsewhere.

77. The Government member of France stated that he could not support the amendment as drafted. France did not wish to see a debate develop in the International Labour Conference between two blocks of countries. Nor did it want to take any position that would inhibit economic development. However the ILO would in due course have to define its position on the matter, since failure to do so would endanger its very survival. The Government member of Germany similarly stressed that the ILO had to pursue the matter, since otherwise it would be handled by the new World Trade Organization alone.

78. The Government member of Pakistan expressed his agreement with the concerns expressed by the Government member of Malaysia concerning proposals to link ILO standards with trade. He suggested to the sponsors of the amendments not to make controversial the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and, in order to make it non-controversial and acceptable to all, that they withdraw their proposed amendments. Thereafter the Workers' Vice-Chairman offered to propose a text based on the subamendment of the Government member of Mexico. However, the Employers' Vice-Chairman objected that almost all of the Government members who had spoken were opposed to the amendment and that this was also the position of his own group. He stated that his group was very firmly opposed to any linkage of international trade with mandatory provisions concerning workers' rights. There was then an exchange on whether or not the discussion of the amendment should continue.

79. In the ensuing discussion the Government members of Egypt and Sudan added their voices to that of the Government member of Malaysia. The Government member of Argentina expressed agreement with the amendment but observed that the only way out would be to stick to the original text of the resolution. The Government members of Guatemala and Nicaragua supported the proposal of the Government member of Mexico to find some new wording that would be acceptable to all. The Government members of Canada, Italy, Norway, the Russian Federation, Spain and the United States appealed for mutual withdrawal of the various amendments relating to the subject of the social clause.

80. The Government member of Mexico proposed the following subamendment:

> Mindful of the fact that the ILO will continue to consider all the aspects of globalization which have an impact on the world of work,

81. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the subamendment rendered the amendment neutral and was acceptable to the Workers' group. He suggested that consideration should now be given to the withdrawal of the other relevant amendments.

82. The Government member of Malaysia, however, proposed an alternative subamendment worded as follows:

> Mindful of the fact that the challenge of globalization and its impact on workers' rights should be discussed by the ILO while issues pertaining to international trade should be discussed by other relevant organizations,

83. The Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that the time had now come for a break for consultations. Following the break, the Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to withdraw amendments D.38 and D.40, on the understanding that this would lead to the withdrawal of amendments D.18, D.21, D.22 and D.24. The Government member of Malaysia confirmed that this would be an acceptable compromise. All six amendments were thus withdrawn.

84. Amendment D.39, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to add after paragraph 4 the following new paragraph:

> Acknowledging that structural change profoundly affects the world of work which requires the ILO to most efficiently pursue its mandate and objectives concerning social justice, including the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment,

85. Introducing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group would have no objection if a reference to "the continued enhancement of working conditions", previously proposed as amendment D.7 now withdrawn, were to be added as a subamendment. The Government members of Canada and the United Kingdom indicated their acceptance of the amendment and the subamendment, with the latter proposing, for stylistic reasons, to replace the words "to most efficiently pursue" by the words "efficiently to pursue".

86. Following some discussion whether or not to refer also to "a better life for workers", the Government member of Mexico proposed that the substance of withdrawn amendment D.7 be incorporated by adding, as a subamendment, the words "and the continued enhancement of working conditions".

87. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that he would not request a vote but that his group's opposition to the amendment should be placed on record. With that, amendment D.39, as subamended, was adopted.

88. Amendment D.10, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to replace paragraph 6 by the following paragraph:

> Thanking the Director-General for his Report to the current Conference, entitled Defending values, promoting change — Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, and taking note of the ideas and proposals contained therein on future orientations and activities of the ILO,

89. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Mexico explained that, as the sponsors did not endorse all the ideas expressed by the Director-General, they wished to formulate two separate propositions, namely to thank him for his Report and to note the ideas and proposals which it contained. She observed that if amendment D.10 were adopted, then logically amendments D.28 and D.41 would fall.

90. The Government member of Canada recalled that the word "welcoming" had not in fact been intended by the sponsors to signify agreement with the ideas of the Director-General but he recognized that it was causing difficulties. The sponsors were therefore prepared to accept the amendment. However, the Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed a preference for the proposal in amendments D.28 and D.41 simply to replace the word "welcoming" by the word "noting".

91. The Government member of Malaysia drew the Committee's attention to amendment D.20, suggesting that this might be combined with amendment D.10. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed reservations about this proposal, noting that amendment D.20 raised a separate issue, namely that of international labour standards. Concerning the drafting of amendment D.10, she proposed that the word "orientations" be replaced by "orientation" in the singular.

92. The Employers' Vice-Chairman appealed to everyone to avoid proposing amendments that were merely cosmetic. In response, various Government members pointed out that the matter under discussion was indeed one of substance, since they did not agree with certain of the ideas and proposals of the Director-General. In the light of these explanations, both the Workers' and the Employers' Vice-Chairmen indicated their support for the amendment. Amendment D.10, as slightly subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom, was adopted.

93. Amendment D.11, submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua, sought to add after paragraph 6 the following new paragraph:

> Aware of the need to invigorate further the above-mentioned improvements of the Governing Body's functions and methods of work,

94. After the Government member of Mexico had introduced the amendment, the Government member of Canada observed that paragraph 5 already referred to the improvements made by the Governing Body and that he did not think it necessary for the resolution to instruct it to make further improvements. He was therefore not in favour of the amendment. The Government member of Mexico agreed to withdraw amendment D.11.

95. Amendment D.17, submitted by the Government members of China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand, sought to add after paragraph 6 the following new paragraph:

> Recognizing the importance of promoting national development through job creation and better employment prospects, particularly for those who have been deprived of opportunities to improve their economic and social well-being,

96. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Malaysia referred to the grave problems of unemployment and structural adjustment facing the developing countries. He suggested that the ILO had to be seen to be helping these countries to overcome their problems and hoped that the amendment would command general agreement.

97. The Government member of Canada stated that he had no objection to the substance of the amendment, but he did not believe that it belonged in the resolution under discussion. He therefore requested that it be withdrawn. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed with the substance of the amendment but observed that it sought to introduce into the resolution text taken from the resolution which had been placed fourth in the ballot. He recalled that at a previous Conference the Committee had ruled against such a procedure. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, expressing the same reservation, indicated that his group could not support the amendment. While not accepting the principle invoked by the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen, the Government member of India agreed to withdraw amendment D.17.

98. Amendment D.29, submitted by the Government members of India and Tunisia, sought to replace the words "discussion of" in paragraph 7 with the words "current debate in the International Labour Conference".

99. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India observed that the word "debate" was already to be found in the French text. The Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that the same idea was to be found in amendment D.42 and that the latter had the advantage of not referring to the "current debate". The Government member of Canada agreed that the word "current" would make no sense when the resolution came up for final adoption, but also pointed out that the "discussion" mentioned in the original text was much more than simply the debate in the Conference. He could not support amendment D.29, but found D.42 acceptable.

100. After some discussion, the Government member of India proposed the following subamendment to amendment D.42:

> Further noting with interest the views expressed in the debate at the Conference as well as the recent contributions of several governments and of the social partners in the ILO to the discussion of the ILO's future;

101. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a further subamendment, to insert before the word "Conference" the words "81st Session of the International Labour". With these two subamendments, amendment D.42 was adopted.

102. Amendment D.19 submitted by the Government members of China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand, sought to introduce a new paragraph worded as follows:

> Fully taking into account paragraph 3 of article 19 of the ILO Constitution and recognizing that the respect for workers' rights and adherence to labour standards should also take into account flexibility and the different stages of development, local conditions and structural adjustment problems.

103. Introducing amendment D.19 on behalf of the sponsors, the Government member of Malaysia explained that the application of standards in developing countries should take into account adaptability to the needs of a changing environment and the level and pace of development, as these countries could not be expected to apply these in the same way as more advanced countries. Paragraph 3 of article 19 in the ILO Constitution allowed for a more flexible application of standards. The intention of the amendment was to reaffirm this principle at a time when excessive legal rigidity could have contributed to the low rate of ratification in the application of standards and was being reassessed.

104. The Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that at this stage of the Committee's work, rather lengthy introductory statements were not really useful. He observed further that one reference to the ILO Constitution could easily lead to proposals that several other references should also be included. He suggested to the authors the withdrawal of their amendment.

105. The Government member of Canada stressed once more that the purpose of the resolution was precisely to allow these issues to be debated further in appropriate fora, but that there was no need to pursue these points in this Committee.

106. In expressing their support for the amendment, the Government members of India, China and Indonesia pointed out that countries at different stages of development needed to proceed differently in matters pertaining to the application of standards.

107. The Government members of Chile and the United Kingdom indicated their preference for the original text. The substantive debate on the issue raised by the amendment was taking place in the plenary and would be pursued. The Government member of the United Kingdom appealed to the authors to withdraw their amendment.

108. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed a compromise subamendment to D.19 worded as follows: "Mindful of the special provisions contained in paragraph 3 of article 19 in the ILO Constitution". The Government member of the United States supported this subamendment.

109. In order to avoid further unnecessary delays, the Workers' Vice-Chairman extended his support to this proposal provided the word "special" would be deleted. The Government member of Mexico expressed her support for this subamendment. With reluctance the Government member of Canada also agreed to the Employers' proposal.

110. The Government member of Malaysia agreed to the proposal, and amendment D.19 as subamended by the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen was adopted, and proposed that the amendment be placed after paragraph 4.

111. Amendment D.20 was withdrawn by the Government member of Malaysia on behalf of the sponsors as the element concerning the re-evaluation of the relevance of the standards had been taken care of in paragraph 6 by amendment D.10.

112. The preambular part of the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Amendments to the operative part

113. Introducing amendment D.12 to paragraph 1 on behalf of the Government members of Guatemala and Nicaragua, the Government member of Mexico indicated that the intention was to distinguish clearly between policy-making organs and means of action in two separate paragraphs whilst maintaining the essence of the original text.

114. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that he was not opposed in principle to the splitting into two new paragraphs, but was opposed to the wording "such as the Governing Body and the Conference" which implied that there were other structures besides. The original text referred only to "structure and means of action" which was preferable.

115. The Government member of Canada observed that the amendment did not really introduce any new points, and that as far as possible, unnecessary redrafting should be avoided and the original text retained.

116. The Workers' Vice-Chairman introduced a subamendment to D.12 reading as follows:

> 1. Calls upon member States, and employers' and workers' organizations, to reaffirm their commitment to the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and to contribute to a strengthening of its structures of policy-making and implementation.
> 2. Encourages also member States, and employers' and workers' organizations, to work together ...

117. Following a debate and a recess for consultations, the Workers' Vice-Chairman introduced a new wording of his subamendment to D.12 as follows:

> 1. Calls upon member States, employers' and workers' organizations to reaffirm the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and to contribute to a strengthening, where necessary, of the ILO's policy-making structures.
> 2. Encourages also member States, and employers' and workers' organizations to work together with a view to a renewal of the means of action of the ILO, and with a view to improving and optimizing the benefits it offers to its constituents in the light of changes in the world.

Amendment D.12 as subamended was adopted.

118. On the understanding that it could be introduced as a subamendment to amendment D.31, the Government member of Mexico accepted to withdraw amendment D.13 which called for the deletion of paragraph 2 of the operative part, the substance of which was to be found in draft amendments to be examined by the Committee at a later stage.

119. Amendment D.31, submitted by the Government members of India and Tunisia sought to replace paragraph 2 by the following text:

> Requests the Director-General of the International Labour Office to have his Report further deliberated at future sessions of the Governing Body taking into account the debate at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

120. After the Government member of India had introduced the amendment, the Government member of Canada observed that this amendment inappropriately suggested that the Director-General's Report to the Conference be rediscussed in the Governing Body and at the insistence of the Director-General. Nevertheless, the sponsors of the resolution recognized that their original wording had led to some misunderstanding. He therefore introduced a subamendment reading as follows:

> Requests the Director-General, in the light of the views expressed in the debate on his report to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference to present options to the Governing Body on how it might best ensure follow-up.

121. The Government members of Nicaragua and the United Kingdom both expressed their preference for the original text. The Director-General would no doubt take account of the debate in the Conference and submit to the Governing Body proposals for the future.

122. The Government member of India wished to introduce a further subamendment to the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Canada seeking to replace the words "... present options to the Governing Body on how it might best ensure follow-up", by the words "... facilitate discussion of ideas and proposals on his report at future sessions of the Governing Body". The Government member of Mexico expressed her agreement with the subamendments proposed by the delegations from both Canada and India and recalled that the proper order was from the Conference to the Governing Body and then to the Director-General.

123. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated he had some problems with the text suggested by the Government member of India and suggested a further subamendment worded as follows: "... to present options to the Governing Body and facilitate how it might best ensure follow-up".

124. The Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Government member of Canada both indicated they could accept the amendment introduced by the Government member of India as subamended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman.

125. The Government member of Egypt, whilst expressing his support for the text proposed by the Government members of Canada and India, observed that it was part of the Director-General's normal duties to facilitate the work of the Governing Body. He further observed that the discussion was far from completed and therefore reference to any follow-up might be somewhat premature.

126. The Employers' Vice-Chairman put the finishing touches to his subamendment with the following wording: "... to present his views on the options available and to facilitate the discussion of these options by the Governing Body".

127. This wording of the subamendment was supported by the Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Government member of Canada speaking on behalf of the 14 co-sponsors of the resolution. Following a last proposal by the Government member of India to substitute "options" with "proposals" which was withdrawn, amendment D.31 as subamended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

128. Amendment D.14 submitted by the Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua sought to replace paragraph 3 with the following text:

> Invites the Governing Body:
> (a) To examine the ideas and proposals contained in the Report of the Director-General, and to take fully into account the contribution and comments made by the Governments and social partners in that respect;
> (b) To discuss and revise all possible ways and means of revitalizing the ILO, and adapting its means of action to the changing world environment and increasing its effectiveness;
> (c) To examine also the strengthening of the programme on the application of standards, in particular:
> (i) the new stages on the elaboration and adoption of Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the possibility to create some more flexible standards;
> (ii) the performance of the mechanisms of the application of standards, considering their future consolidation, the need for the enlargement of their responsibilities or the creation of new bodies.

129. The amendment was introduced by the Government member of Mexico, who indicated that it should be read in conjunction with amendment D.31 discussed earlier. She further subamended her proposal by deleting the words "as well as the possibility to create some more flexible standards".

130. The Government member of Canada observed that the amendment in its point (a) simply added that the views of governments and employers' and workers' organizations should be taken into account, a point already covered earlier. In its point (b), he observed that little change to the existing paragraph 3(a) was introduced, whereas its point (c) was entirely new and covered only one aspect of the debate to come. In sum he was of the view that the proposed amendment was not very helpful.

131. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to the authors of the amendment that it be withdrawn on the understanding that their concerns could be introduced when discussing other amendments. Following some discussion, the Government member of Mexico agreed to withdraw amendment D.14, indicating that it was important to distinguish the two stages proposed in subparagraphs (a) and (b).

132. Amendment D.23, submitted by the Government members of China, India, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand, sought to replace paragraph 3(a) by the following text:

> to examine the ideas and proposals in the Director-General's Report with a view to reviewing the role, structures and means of action of the ILO in order to revitalize

it fully taking into consideration the debate at the International Labour Conference;

133. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India asked the floor to be given to the Workers' Vice-Chairman, who had consulted him on a subamendment to which he had agreed. The amendment, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman read as follows:

> to examine the ideas and proposals in the Director-General's Report with a view to a renewal, and where appropriate strengthening of the role, structures and means of action of the ILO taking into consideration the debate at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference;

134. The Government member of Canada indicated that he did not disagree with this amendment but preferred the clearer original text. The Employers' Vice-Chairman disagreed with the deletion of the word "revitalize" which was different from "strengthening".

135. The Government members of Chile and the United Kingdom expressed their preference for the original text.

136. The Workers' Vice-Chairman and the Government member of the United Kingdom suggested the original text could be retained if the word "further" were inserted after the words "to revitalizing" in paragraph 3 (a). The Government member of Canada and the Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed their support for this suggestion.

137. The Government members of Mexico and Nicaragua pointed out that the Spanish translation of this paragraph presented some problems, as the word "revitalize" which did exist in Spanish was not used.

138. Amendment D.23 was not adopted.

139. As a result, amendment D.44 presented by the Workers' group fell.

140. Amendment D.32 submitted by the Government members of India and Tunisia sought to replace paragraph 3 (b) with the words "to keep the Conference informed of the outcome". The amendment was introduced by the Government member of India. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed his preference for the original text but was prepared to accept this amendment. Amendment D.32 was adopted.

141. As a result, amendments D.45, D.26, D.15 and D.16 fell.

143. The operative part of the resolution was adopted, as amended.

Adoption of the resolution

144. The resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation was adopted, as amended, by consensus.

Resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development

Presentation of the two original texts

145. The two resolutions which were later merged in the above resolution were each presented as follows by one of their authors.

146. The Workers' member of Burkina Faso introduced the resolution concerning ILO action in preparation for the World Summit for Social Development on behalf of the co-authors. He stressed that the ILO could and should play an important role not only in the preparation to the Summit but also in the work that would result from it. More than any other international organization, the ILO had a unique contribution to make to this Summit. The resolution sought to secure that governments, employers and workers in all ILO member States, as well as the ILO itself, spared no effort to ensure the success of the Summit. At the time of the presentation he indicated that the authors of the resolution were open to combining their text with that of others.

147. The Workers' member of Morocco introduced the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development on behalf of the co-authors. The resolution was first and foremost designed to emphasize the importance all parties attach to this initiative. It called upon the ILO to take an active part at all stages of the Summit, in the preparation, during the Summit itself and in the follow-up work. The social partners should be fully involved in these tasks both at the national level and in the delegations selected to attend. The World Summit on Social Development should mark a turning point in the elimination of poverty, exclusion and unemployment which represent major threats to world peace. At the time of presentation the speaker indicated the authors' openness to possible mergers with similar texts.

General discussion

148. The Workers' Vice-Chairman related this draft merged resolution to the substantive text adopted by the Committee the previous year which provided much of the background and rationale. He recalled the various initiatives taken by the ILO Governing Body and its Working Party on the Summit and by the Office in the preparatory work leading to the World Summit for Social Development. The purpose of this resolution, which was largely procedural, was to underline the position and role of the ILO and its constituents in this process. The operative part stressed that employers' and workers' organizations should be involved in national preparatory work and in national delegations to the Summit. He acknowledged that the Summit was not tripartite, but as it concerned the core mandate of the ILO, the organization should be represented at all stages in keeping with its mandate, including in the follow-up to the Summit.

149. The Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed his support in principle for the resolution which recalled the mission of the ILO, stressed the legitimate role of Employers' and Workers' organizations and encouraged the widest possible participation in preparations for the Summit. It was important to underscore the issues to be addressed by the Summit and the mandate of the ILO in this regard, including in the follow-up work. The draft resolution needed some fine-tuning such as the references to structural change and cooperation with the international lending institutions in the preamble. The success of the Summit rested on addressing both economic growth and social dimensions. The reference to a World Social Charter could not be endorsed by the employers. Some amendments would therefore be proposed along these lines as well as to paragraphs 8, 9 and 11 in the preamble and paragraph 1(e) in the operative part. On the other hand several parts could be readily endorsed by the speaker's group.

150. The Government member of Poland expressed her support for the resolution. She was encouraged by the growing recognition worldwide of the need for a new form of social development. In recent years, profound political and economic changes had not been accompanied by similar progress in social development. Economic adjustment worldwide had been associated with a deteriorating quality of life, growing poverty and unemployment and discontent particularly among young people. The human and social costs of economic reform were particularly important in Central and Eastern Europe and could undermine the reform process itself. The speaker was hopeful that the Summit preparations and the Summit itself would address these issues.

151. The Government member of Italy stated that his delegation looked upon the Summit as a unique opportunity for an evaluation of the world social situation and for a strengthening of the struggle against poverty and unemployment. This required a well coordinated international response. The ILO stood at the forefront of this struggle and its contribution to this high-level meeting was essential. Subject to some remarks on wording, such as the reference to a World Social Charter which might prejudge the outcome of the Summit, his delegation supported this resolution.

152. The Government member of Spain pointed out that the context in which the Summit was taking place required a careful assessment of what the ILO and the UN could reasonably achieve. He saw some convergence in the arguments of the two groups whilst supporting the remarks of the Employers' Vice-Chairman. He indicated that the wording of some of the paragraphs needed some clarification. There was reference to the informal tripartite meeting at ministerial level on employment, the conclusions of which had not yet been communicated. The reference to a World Social Charter should be set within the declaration and programme of action to be adopted. Tripartism needed to be strengthened but such recommendations needed to be as practical as possible. The operative part also needed some specification as to what exactly was sought. Paragraph 2(c) needed to be couched in more general terms. Similarly paragraph 2(d) was too restrictive and needed to address economic growth and social development.

153. The Government member of the United Kingdom indicated her support for the broad intention of the resolution. Her Government favoured a pragmatic approach which would avoid costly new machinery for vetting social policies of governments. The Summit should concentrate on an effective sharing of experience, including that existing in UN agencies. She indicated that the theme of productive employment was critical to the Summit's social objectives and supported the view that detailed solutions to unemployment were best found at the national level. Her delegation would have a number of amendments to offer, mostly of tone and nuance rather than substance. For instance, she preferred to refer to the expansion of productive employment rather than the struggle against unemployment. Some amendments would also be proposed on the role of the social partners. It was not an ILO summit nor was the UN a tripartite organization. Finally the reference to a World Social Charter raised a major problem and it would be safer to leave it out.

154. The Government member of the Philippines considered the resolution both timely and relevant. The resolution would provide useful guidance to the ongoing preparatory work to the Summit. The role of the ILO in preparations for the Summit was central in view of the three main issues to be addressed but also in view of the wealth of experience found in the ILO. There was a pressing need for ILO's constituencies to collectively prepare and actively take part in the Summit.

155. The Government member of Germany expressed the hope that the discussion would proceed rapidly enough to ensure that, within the time available to the Committee, the resolution would be duly adopted.

156. The Government member of Chile recalled the crucial role his country was playing in the Summit. This resolution was complementary to earlier decisions of the Governing Body and preparatory work to the Summit, all of which conveyed a shared desire to design strategies and policy measures for tackling the broad social issues at hand. He supported the resolution.

157. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic indicated that human and social resources were critical in all societies. Social problems needed to be addressed in structural adjustment policies. The ILO was to contribute meaningfully to the Summit as well as in the follow-up. Some amendments would be proposed.

158. The Government member of Pakistan supported this resolution which underscored issues of poverty, employment and structural adjustment central to developing countries. He was particularly pleased with paragraphs 1(d) and 2(c) in the operative part which gave the ILO a leading role in the preparatory work for the Summit and in the follow-up. The close association of Employers' and Workers' organizations in the work of the Summit needed to be stressed. The inclusion of their representatives in national delegations should pose no problem.

159. The Government member of Egypt indicated that the three issues to be addressed at the Summit called for an integrated approach to development which should be reflected in the preamble of the resolution. Peace, economic growth and social justice needed to be addressed in a comprehensive manner. Productive employment was a powerful means to reduce poverty and enhance social integration. Development also required effective coordination. The speaker referred to the document prepared by the UN Secretary-General entitled "Agenda for Development" and made available to conference delegates which provided an in-depth analysis of a broad range of social development issues. Finally he felt that it was too early to speak of the outcome of the Summit, particularly with regard to a World Social Charter. Some redrafting of the preamble and the operative part would be suggested along these lines.

160. The Government member of the United States viewed the Summit as an important opportunity to develop a strategy for sustainable human development. Her Government thought the ILO should play a key role, particularly as the issues to be addressed were central to ILO's mandate. She referred to the excellent documentation and outstanding discussion at the informal tripartite meeting at ministerial level on employment and looked forward to receiving the report.

161. The Government member of Senegal acknowledged that the ILO had a central role to play in the preparation for the Summit, during the Summit itself and in the follow-up. He called on the ILO to assist governments confronted with the social consequences of structural adjustment. Likewise, the international community should be encouraged to design and implement a programme of action addressing the world social crisis. He expressed his full support for the resolution.

162. The Government member of Argentina supported the resolution and the active role of the ILO in the Summit. The ILO's tripartite constituents were confronted with a range of social problems which all needed to be addressed. He also mentioned the important role that the Ambassador of Chile, Mr. Somavia, is playing in the preparation for the Summit. The reference to the World Social Charter should be more concrete and specific as mere goodwill rarely sufficed.

163. The Government member of Mexico supported the previous speaker and indicated that the most important thing for her Government was the role and function of the ILO in social development. It was incumbent on all three groups to find solutions to such issues as poverty, unemployment, malnutrition and economic migration. She supported the resolution but wished to see some ambiguities in the text clarified, as well as greater specification of the role of the ILO in the preparations for the Summit , during the Summit and in the aftermath. She also wished to see the conclusions of the informal tripartite meeting at ministerial level on employment before judging them. Nothing prevented governments from including the social partners in national delegations.

164. The Government member of Bulgaria expressed his delegation's full support for the Summit. The resolution reflected a common will to bring new initiatives to social thinking and he supported it in principle. There was some room for improvement in the operative part. In particular the social dimensions of economic development in a period of transition needed more attention. An amendment along these lines would be presented.

165. The Government member of Nicaragua shared the views of the government member of Spain. He had some reservations on paragraph 2(d). The globalization of the economy in which large multinational companies held a prominent position required closer coordination with international financial institutions. Deregulation policies adopted in some countries had not, so far, significantly reduced poverty. The World Social Charter was perhaps utopian but brought in an element of hope. He called for the resolution to be adopted.

166. The Government member of Malaysia expressed his support for the resolution. It was important for the Summit to address problems of unemployment, poverty and productivity, as such problems were no longer found only in developing countries. Human resource development in developing and developed countries were of critical importance. Although it would not be a tripartite Summit, the inputs of the social partners should be included. Any amendments enabling the resolution to be adopted by consensus would receive his delegation's support.

167. The Government member of India noted that poverty, unemployment and social exclusion were morally, socially and economically unacceptable. In resolution 47/92 the General Assembly had recognized that these issues were interlinked and that there could be no peace and international security without sustainable and equitable development. Deliberate measures were required to accelerate the expansion of productive employment. He had some reservations on paragraph 1(c)(ii) and would propose some amendments.

168. The Government member of Finland observed that his Government actively supported the Summit and therefore also supported this resolution. His delegation had no problems with the text of the resolution but remained open to any amendments.

169. The Government member of France welcomed the resolution. He paid tribute to the work already accomplished by the ILO in the preparations for the Summit but felt the ILO's role needed to be further strengthened. His delegation had some reservations on two points of the resolution. The Summit would adopt a declaration but not necessarily a World Social Charter. There was already a European Social Charter as well as the ILO's Philadelphia Declaration. The second point related to tripartite participation in the national delegations and the participation of the ILO itself. This was particularly important in the current preparatory work in which the ILO should be strongly represented since by January 1995 it would be too late to significantly bear on the issues at hand. He urged that no time should be lost as much work still lay ahead.

170. The Government member of Bangladesh supported a comprehensive resolution which would provide clear guidance to the ILO. Much more was required to combat unemployment and poverty in the least developed countries (LDCs) such as Bangladesh. Assistance from developed partners and international organizations was required, as well as debt relief measures. His delegation would propose some amendments to include appropriate references to the LDCs in the preamble and the operative parts of the resolution. He requested information on the working party of the Governing Body on the Summit and on the outcome of the informal tripartite meeting at ministerial level on employment.

171. The Government member of Portugal expressed support for the essential principles of the resolution. He shared the observations made by the Government member of Spain and would propose some amendments.

172. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that 22 governments had made supportive statements as had the Employers' group. He observed that despite broad agreement on the resolution, a large number of amendments would be proposed. Some would relate only to drafting points, and he hoped suitable wording could be found. He briefly commented on some of the remarks made in paragraphs 3, 4, 8, 9 and 11 in the preamble. As to the points raised on the operative part, his group was ready to consider these.

173. A representative of the Secretary-General responded to the queries raised by various Committee members. The working party of the Governing Body on the Summit was set up in March 1993 to guide the Organization's inputs to the preparatory work. It was composed of five representatives each of governments, employers and workers. It had adopted a comprehensive statement about the ILO's views on the Summit and had submitted a list of points to be included in the draft declaration and programme of action.

174. As regards the tripartite meeting at ministerial level on employment, it was an informal meeting convened to allow Ministers of Labour as well as Employers' and Workers' representatives to comment on an Office paper prepared at the request of the Summit preparatory committee. This document would now be revised in the light of the rich contributions received. There would be no report nor record of the meeting.

Consideration of amendments

175. Fifty-five amendments, numbered D.47 to D.101, were submitted for examination.

Amendments to the preamble

176. The Committee adopted the title and paragraph 1 of the preamble without amendment.

177. Amendment D.83, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to add after paragraph 1 the following new paragraph:

> Considering the vital importance of peace, economic growth and social justice as the essential components necessary for development,

178. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Egypt indicated that equal weight should be given to each of the three elements mentioned. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that his group had no objections to the amendment. The Government member of Germany, recalling the aims of the World Summit on Social Development, proposed a subamendment to add before the word "development" the word "social". The Employers' Vice-Chairman supported the amendment and the subamendment.

179. The Government member of Malaysia also supported the amendment, but proposed a subamendment to add a fourth element, namely "human resource development". The Government member of Egypt accepted the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Germany, but preferred to hear what other members thought about the inclusion of "human resource development". The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that if this fourth element was to be included, then it would be necessary to add a whole list of other things of commensurate importance. He did however support the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Germany. Amendment D.83 was adopted as subamended by the Government member of Germany.

180. Amendment D.64, submitted by the Government members of Germany and the United States, sought to replace in paragraph 1 the words "of the struggle against unemployment, poverty and social exclusion" by the words "for the expansion of productive employment, reduction of unemployment, reduction and elimination of widespread poverty and promotion of social integration,"

181. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United States noted that it did not represent a change of substance, but merely sought to give a more accurate description of the aims of the Summit. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed a subamendment to add before the words "productive employment" the words "full, freely chosen and" and to delete the word "widespread". The Government member of Germany and the Employers' Vice-Chairman both indicated their agreement with the subamendment. Amendment D.64 was adopted as subamended.

182. As a result amendment D.53, submitted by the Government members of Canada, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, fell.

183. Amendment D.68, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace in paragraph 3 the words "structural changes which take place in the world economy today have consequences on employment, social exclusion, poverty and migration for economic reasons" with the words "the social and living conditions of people become particularly vulnerable during periods of profound political and economic change,"

184. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman recalled that the subject of this paragraph had been discussed in the Committee the previous year in the context of the resolution concerning social protection and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy. As that resolution had been adopted by consensus, the amendment proposed to use the same formulation. The Workers' Vice-Chairman accepted the amendment in principle but, pointing out that the previous year's resolution had concerned inter alia structural adjustment, to which references in this paragraph now would be deleted, he proposed to replace the words "political and economic" by the word "structural". The Employers' Vice-Chairman agreed to the subamendment. Amendment D.68 was adopted as subamended.

185. As a result, amendment D.84, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, and amendment D.54, submitted by the Government members of Canada, France, Germany, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and the United States, both fell.

186. Amendment D.69, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to add after paragraph 3 the following new paragraph:

> Convinced that economic efficiency and growth, and their interaction with adequate social protection, are important prerequisites for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

187. The Employers' Vice-Chairman introduced the amendment, noting that here too the previous year's formulation was a good one and should be used again. The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated his group's agreement. Amendment D.69 was adopted.

188. Amendment D.55, submitted by the Government members of the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 4 by the following text:

> Mindful of the need to address social consequences that may arise from structural adjustment policies, including those promoted by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank,

189. Following the introduction of the amendment by the Government member of the United States, the Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated his group's agreement to it. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, also supporting the amendment, noted that it was important to remember that the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank were not the only financial institutions concerned and that the word "including" was therefore appropriate. Amendment D.55 was adopted.

190. As a result, amendment D.70, submitted by the Employers' group, amendment D.66, submitted by the Government member of Bangladesh, and amendment D.86, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, all fell.

191. Amendment D.85, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to add after paragraph 4 the following new paragraph:

> Recognizing the importance of international cooperation to support national efforts to promote social development,

192. After the introduction of the amendment by the Government member of Egypt, the Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that his group had no problem with the proposed text. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also supported the amendment, recalling that this too was an issue that had been discussed the previous year. The Government member of Mexico expressed her support for the amendment, but proposed a subamendment to add after the word "support" the words "or complement". In response to a question from the Employers' Vice-Chairman, she explained that international cooperation was based on the principle that it is necessary not only to support but also to complement national efforts; if only the word "support" were used, this could mean that international cooperation would be called upon to assume the entire burden. The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that his group would prefer in that case to say "and complement", a proposal supported by the Employers' Vice-Chairman. Amendment D.85 was adopted as subamended.

193. Amendment D.47, submitted by the Government member of Sweden and seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, sought to delete in paragraph 5 the words "and the opportunity that the Summit offers for the preparation of a comprehensive programme of action for the United Nations system,".

194. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Sweden said that he supported the resolution as drafted and did not feel strongly about the amendment which was linked to another amendment (D.50) concerning the operative part of the resolution. He indicated that alternatively he would be pleased to support amendment D.57. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that his group would prefer to retain the original text, noting the likelihood that the Summit would indeed adopt a programme of action. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a subamendment which would retain the original text but replace the words "the global social crisis" by the words "global social issues" and substitute the word "appropriate" for the word "comprehensive". The Workers' Vice-Chairman said he could agree to the former proposal, if it was slightly reformulated as "global social problems".

195. The Government member of India, supported the subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom. However, referring to amendment D.87, he noted that the problems were of both a social and an economic nature and therefore proposed a further subamendment to add before the word "problems" the words "and economic".

196. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said he had initially not been in favour of the phrase which the amendment sought to delete. As regards the subamendment of the Government Member of the United Kingdom, he felt that the word "comprehensive" should be retained in preference to the word "appropriate", as the latter was subjective and left a lot of uncertainty about the nature of the action programme to be adopted and as an economic framework was necessary in order to deal with social problems. The Government member of Germany also supported the idea of retaining the word "comprehensive". The Workers' Vice-Chairman added that the word "comprehensive" had the advantage of helping to meet the concerns expressed earlier by the Government member of India.

197. The Government member of the United Kingdom accepted the phrase "global social problems" and, recalling that an ILO preparatory document for the Summit had stressed the importance of national as well as international action, proposed to refer to a "comprehensive and appropriate" programme of action. The Government member of Sudan stressed that there really was a crisis and proposed the insertion of the word "acute" before the words "social problems". The Government member of India recalled the subamendment which he had earlier proposed, noting that poverty had an important economic dimension. The Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that to add the words "and economic" would go beyond the aims of the Summit. He appreciated the support of certain governments for the word "crisis", but felt that "problems" was not inappropriate as it reflected the fact that the crisis had a number of different aspects. He could not agree to dealing only with "acute" social problems. In response to the Government member of the United Kingdom, he suggested using the words "appropriate comprehensive" to qualify "programme of action".

198. After an intervention from the Government member of Syria stressing the link between social and economic development, the Government member of India agreed to withdraw amendment D.87, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, seeking to introduce the words "and economic" after the word "social" in paragraph 5. The Government member of Mexico indicated certain inconsistencies in the Spanish translation of amendment D.47.

199. The Government delegate of the United Kingdom suggested the deletion of "the" before "global". With the agreement of the Employers' Vice-Chairman, amendment D.47, as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was accordingly adopted.

200. Amendment D.88, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to introduce a new paragraph 6 worded as follows:

> Recognizing the need to coordinate the activities of organizations and agencies working in development and the need for a clear commitment by each of them to work towards common and compatible goals and objectives,

201. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Egypt explained that several UN bodies had competence in the field of social development which implied there was a need for coordination to avoid duplication as well as to ensure full coverage.

202. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the amendment did not mention the ILO nor did it specify which organizations and agencies it was referring to. He observed that non-governmental organizations could also be construed to be included and wished to avoid implying that their work should be coordinated by any third party. The text as it stood was not appropriate in a tripartite body.

203. The Employers' Vice-Chairman also pointed to the problems of interpretation he faced with this text which did not say who would be coordinating what. The Government member of the United Kingdom, whilst expressing her sympathy with the ideas of the amendment, stated she had similar problems with the wording of the text. She invited the authors to withdraw it. In response to this request the Government member of Egypt withdrew amendment D.88.

204. Amendment D.71, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to introduce five changes of wording to paragraph 6. In introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman apologized for the cumbersome presentation of the changes proposed.

205. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that this amendment by implication also amended paragraph 7 addressed in amended D.72, and indicated he could go along with the suggested changes if he could slightly modify the Employers' proposal. He concurred with the deletion of the word "core" before the word "issues" in the first line of paragraph 6, as well as with the addition of the words "and competence" after the word "mandate" in the second line, in accordance with the Employers' proposals. He further proposed that the rest of the paragraph read as follows:

> Accordingly the ILO has a primary responsibility and role to play in preparation and conduct of the Summit and in the consideration and implementation of conclusions which fall within its competence.

206. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed to the text as proposed in spite of its rather long and complicated nature. She suggested the two parts could be turned into two separate paragraphs. The Workers' Vice-Chairman readily agreed to this suggestion.

207. The Employers' Vice-Chairman concurred with this last suggestion and suggested that the second paragraph just proposed should start with the words "Considering also the ILO has a primary responsibility...". He further suggested the deletion of the article "the" in the first line of paragraph 6 to read "Considering that issues to be examined ...".

208. The Government member of Mexico expressed her support for the changes proposed and pointed to some problems in the interpretation into Spanish. The Government member of Finland suggested the addition of the words "recognizing therefore that" as a way of linking the suggested two new paragraphs. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to start the second new paragraph with the words "Considering therefore that ..."

209. Amendment D.71 was adopted as subamended. The wording of the suggested paragraphs now reads as follows:

> Considering that core issues to be examined by the Summit are central to the mandate and competence of the ILO;
> Considering therefore that the ILO has a primary responsibility and role to play in the preparation and conduct of the Summit and in the consideration and implementation of conclusions which fall within its competence.

210. As a result, amendments D.89 and D.58 fell.

211. Amendment D.72 submitted by the Employers' group sought to delete paragraph 7. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman explained that with the adoption of amendment D.71 this paragraph became redundant. The Workers' Vice-Chairman concurred and the amendment was accordingly adopted. As a result, amendment D.90 fell.

212. Amendment D.73 submitted by the Employers' group sought to delete the words "and representation" in paragraph 8. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman recognized that the Summit was primarily one of governments and that it would be presumptuous to believe that tripartite representation should be imposed at all stages of the Summit. The tripartite input referred to in the paragraph was meant to include participation of representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as advisers in national delegations.

213. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to the suggested change provided the word "input" was interpreted broadly to mean participation, consultation and representation, and written in the plural. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed to the Workers' proposal and suggested the word "appropriate" be inserted before the word "stages" in the recognition of the fact that it was primarily a government Summit.

214. The Employers' Vice-Chairman thanked the authors for these carefully drafted proposals and suggested the word "appropriate" might best be placed before the words "tripartite inputs". The paragraph would thus read as follows:

> Stressing the need for appropriate tripartite inputs at all stages of the Summit process.

This proposal received wide support and amendment D.73 as subamended was adopted.

215. As a result, amendments D.48, D.91 and D.59 all fell.

216. Amendment D.92, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to delete paragraph 9. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Egypt indicated that the sponsors supported tripartism wholeheartedly but that the substance of paragraph 9 was already found in the preceding paragraph. Furthermore, he indicated that the Committee should avoid a lengthy discussion of how to define "balanced standards".

217. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted the observations of the speaker and proposed that the authors withdraw their amendment on the understanding that amendment D.74 proposing a redraft of this paragraph would be adopted. The Government member of Egypt agreed to this suggestion and withdrew his amendment.

218. Amendment D.74 submitted by the Employers' group suggested a redrafting of paragraph 9 as follows:

> Also stressing the importance of the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, as appropriate, in the development of policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems, especially for the most vulnerable groups of the population.

219. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that he also had difficulties with the wording of paragraph 9, and felt a different formulation was required which he drew from the operative paragraph 1(d) of last year's resolution as the basis for this amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairman concurred with this amendment which was adopted. As a result, amendment D.65 fell.

220. Paragraph 10 was adopted without amendment.

221. Amendment D.49, submitted by the Government member of Sweden and seconded by the Government member of Finland, was withdrawn.

222. Amendment D.93, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to replace paragraph 11 by the following text:

> Noting also the views expressed during the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment on 10 June 1994 in respect of the Summit,

223. After the Government member of Egypt had introduced the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that he had a problem with paragraph 11, as neither he nor most of his group had attended the meeting and as there was no record of what had taken place. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested a slightly different formulation linking paragraph 11 to what was said in paragraph 10. The Government member of the United Kingdom shared the concern expressed by the Employers' Vice-Chairman and felt uncomfortable with the compromise tentatively proposed by the Workers' Vice-Chairman. She would prefer simply to note that the meeting had taken place and that the Office and the Director-General would take account of the views expressed. The Government member of Jordan proposed a subamendment merely noting that the informal meeting had taken place. The Government member of France feared that to refer to an informal meeting in the resolution would be to dilute the importance of the ILO and he preferred the proposal of the Government member of Sweden to delete paragraph 11. The Government member of Romania noted the importance of the ILO documentation prepared for the informal meeting and proposed replacing paragraph 11 by adding a reference to this in paragraph 10.

224. As he did not know what the views expressed at the informal meeting were, the Employers' Vice-Chairman stressed the need to avoid expressing any judgement on the meeting. The Government representative of Mexico agreed with the Government member of the United Kingdom that it was not possible to take note of the views expressed in the meeting, but she did feel that the resolution could refer to the meeting and to the ILO preparatory document and suggested a subamendment along those lines. The Government member of the United States said that ideally there would be a corresponding paragraph in the operative part and paragraph 11 would then simply note that the informal meeting had taken place. The Government member of Senegal suggested another subamendment requesting the Director-General to submit to the Summit a report on the informal meeting. The Government member of the United Kingdom recalled that there was as yet no record of the meeting and wondered whether the problem might not be solved by a small addition to paragraph 10.

225. The Workers' Vice-Chairman said that a simple text was required noting that the meeting had taken place, but not passing any judgement on it. In response the Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed the following subamendment:

> Also noting that discussions took place at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment held on 10 June 1994 on issues to be addressed at the Summit,

226. The Government member of France suggested that reference should be made to the preparations for the Summit, as in paragraph 10. In response the Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the formulation proposed by the Employers' Vice-Chairman included both the preparations and the Summit itself. The Employers' Vice-Chairman further proposed to replace the words "at the Summit" by the words "in connection with the Summit". Amendment D.93, as subamended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was adopted.

227. Amendment D.75, submitted by the Employers' group, fell.

228. The preamble was adopted as amended.

Amendments to the operative part

> to take the competence, mandate and work of the ILO into consideration in their preparation for the Summit;

230. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Egypt reminded the Committee that a UN resolution had already invited member States to prepare for the Summit and that it was unnecessary for the ILO to do so again. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that the amendment involved little more than a change in the order of the words and expressed his preference for retaining the original. Even though the UN had called on member States to prepare for the Summit, he felt that the ILO should also call on them, as well as on employers' and workers' organizations, to prepare for it taking account of the competence, mandate and work of the ILO. The Employers' Vice-Chairman felt that the amendment was not materially different from the original. The Government member of Egypt agreed to withdraw amendment D.94.

231. Amendment D.95, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to replace paragraph 1(b) by the following text:

> to adopt and implement a declaration and a programme of action addressing effectively the issues of unemployment, poverty and social exclusion;

232. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India noted that it simplified the text and deleted the reference to a World Social Charter. The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed that it was useful to streamline this paragraph and acknowledged that the idea of mentioning at this stage a World Social Charter did not meet with universal approval. He suggested that a subamendment to D.95 might be formulated building, inter alia, on the text of amendment D.52. The Government member of India recalled that a UN resolution had already mentioned that the Summit should adopt a declaration and a programme of action addressed to the three subjects of the Summit and suggested that the present resolution should refer to these three subjects in the same terms. The Government member of Germany said that the position stated by the Government member of India was basically correct, but he would wish to see one addition, namely to refer not just to unemployment, but rather to the expansion of employment and the reduction of unemployment. The Government member of the United Kingdom also felt that it was important to refer to the promotion of employment as well as the alleviation of unemployment. She appreciated the desire expressed by the Government member of India to respect the language of the UN, but felt it was also important to aim at consistency with the language used in other ILO documents. The Government member of India expressed agreement with the proposal of the Government member of Germany.

233. Referring to the suggestion made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman concerning a possible subamendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that if the wording proposed in amendment D.52 were to be used, then the word "widespread"should be deleted. In response, the Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to the deletion of "widespread"so that his subamendment would read as follows:

> to adopt and implement a declaration and a programme of action which will address effectively the issues of expansion of productive employment and reduction of unemployment, reduction and elimination of poverty and promotion of social integration;

234. The Employers' Vice-Chairman supported the subamendment, but proposed that the word "will" be replaced by "should". The Government member of India indicated his acceptance of the subamendment and the Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed on the substitution of "should" for "will". Amendment D.95 was adopted as subamended.

235. As a result, amendment D.52, submitted by the Government members of Germany and the United States, amendment D.50, submitted by the Government member of Sweden, amendment D.61, submitted by the Government members of Canada and the United States, amendment D.60, submitted by the Government members of Canada, France, Germany, the United Kingdom and the United States, and amendment D.76, submitted by the Employers' group, all fell.

236. Amendment D.62, submitted by the Government members of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, sought to replace paragraph 1(c) by the following text:

to promote actively the appropriate involvement of employers and workers and their organizations in the preparations for, conduct of and follow-up to the Summit;

237. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom noted that its intention was to tidy up the original text, by saying the same things in a shorter and simpler fashion. In response the Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that there had been a general understanding that the resolution could be prescriptive, if not on substance at least on procedure. Paragraph (c) and its three separate points were of great importance for the resolution as they gave it more real content. He therefore proposed a subamendment as follows:

> to promote the appropriate involvement of employers' and workers' organizations in the preparations for, conduct of, and follow-up to the Summit by:
> (i) involving employers' and workers' organizations in the national preparations for the Summit;
> (ii) including representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as advisers in the national delegations to the Summit;
> (iii) making practical arrangements for substantial active participation by the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations at the Summit;

238. The Government member of the United Kingdom took the view that the text proposed was still very elaborate and added that it was not realistic to expect every member State to follow all the suggestions made in such detail. The Government member of India supported her position, as did the Government members of the Russian Federation and the United States. The latter added that in her country, although employers' and workers' organizations were being involved in the national preparations, no thought had been given to the possibility of including them in the national delegation.

239. The Government member of Finland felt that no harm would be done if the ILO took up the issue of tripartism in the manner suggested in the Workers' Vice-Chairman's amendment. The Government member of Mexico also expressed support for this subamendment. The fact that the Summit would be a UN meeting should not, she observed, prevent member States from structuring their delegations as they thought fit. The Government member of Chile also supported the subamendment, commenting that if the ILO were to be fully realistic, many pages of its Conventions, Recommendations and resolutions could be saved as well as time in discussing them. The Government member of Malaysia, however, thought it was important to be realistic as this was not a tripartite Summit and supported the position taken by his colleagues from India and the United Kingdom.

240. Noting that it would be difficult to reach a compromise solution, the Government member of the United Kingdom inquired what the views of the Employers' group were on the subject. The Employers' Vice-Chairman observed that wherever such a Summit was to take place, employers' and workers' organizations had an interest in the proceedings. The outcome was likely to have implications for employers and people at work. He would like these organizations to be involved in the national preparations, to see their representatives included in national delegations and to have practical arrangements made for their active participation. If they were not included in national delegations, he asked how would it be possible to consult them on issues of concern to them were raised in the debate? Of course, some member States might not respond, but that was no reason for not expressing the wish.

241. Acknowledging that there appeared to be majority support for the Workers' Vice-Chairman's subamendment, the Government member of the United Kingdom suggested that the insertion of the word "considering" at the beginning of subparagraph (ii) would make it easier for some Government members to accept. The Workers' Vice-Chairman observed that he could accept the addition of the word "considering". After a short break for consultations, he explained in detail his subamendment and proposed the following revised text:

> to promote the appropriate involvement of employers' and workers' organizations in the preparations for, conduct of, and follow-up to the Summit by:
> (i) involving employers' and workers' organizations in the national preparations for the Summit;
> (ii) considering including representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as advisers in the national delegations to the Summit;
> (iii) considering the practical arrangements for an active participation by the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations at the Summit;

242. The Government member of the Russian Federation observed that the Workers' Vice-Chairman's explanation had been very useful, but that he could make no commitment about the suggestions in subparagraphs (ii) and (iii). He therefore considered that the text proposed in amendment D.62 was sufficient and asked that his reservations on the subamendment be placed on record. Amendment D.62 was then adopted as subamended by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

243. As a result, amendment D.96, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, and amendments D.77, D.78 and D.79, submitted by the Employers' group, all fell.

244. Amendment D.97, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to replace paragraph 1(d) with the following text:

> to recognize the competence of the ILO regarding the core issues in preparation, conduct and follow-up of the Summit;

245. The Government member of India introduced the amendment by indicating that its intention was simply to replace the word "ensure" with "recognize". The Workers' Vice-Chairman agreed to this relatively minor change, but indicated he would prefer the word "primarily" to be retained as in the original text. The Employers' Vice-Chairman followed suit with the understanding that, as argued by him on an earlier occasion of this text, the words "the core themes" would be changed to "core themes".

246. The Government member of the United Kingdom agreed to these suggestions and added that for drafting consistency the following wording would be preferable: "... in the preparation for, conduct of and follow-up to ...". With these changes, amendment D.97, as subamended, was adopted. The paragraph now reads:

> (d) to recognize the primary competence of the ILO regarding core themes in the preparation for, conduct of, and follow-up to the Summit;

247. Amendment D.98, submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, sought to delete paragraph 1(e). Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Egypt indicated that the reference to tripartite involvement in national economic and social decision-making in the paragraph raised serious problems for the authors. Moreover, this matter had already been addressed in great detail in the previous paragraph.

248. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested that for the sake of the logic of the text, if D.98 could be withdrawn, then amendment D.63 still to be considered could give way to amendment D.80 submitted by the Employers' group and which was built on language agreed upon last year.

249. The Employers' Vice-Chairman was happy to confirm support for his group's amendment D.80, which sought to replace paragraph 1(e) with the following text:

> to strengthen the active participation of workers' and employers' organizations in the formulation of policies and action to deal with the issues arising out of the Summit.

250. In the light of the Workers' Vice-Chairman's suggestion, and on behalf of the co-sponsors, the Government member of the United Kingdom agreed to withdraw amendment D.63 submitted by the Government members of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States, which sought to replace paragraph 1(e) with a new text. Likewise the Government member of Egypt accepted to withdraw amendment D.98, although he pointed out he still had some problems with the formulation of amendment D.80.

251. Taking these observations into consideration, the Employers' Vice-Chairman suggested a subamendment to his amendment worded as follows: "... in the formulation of follow-up action arising out of the Summit." The Government member of India accepted this formulation and amendment D.80, as subamended, was adopted. As a result, amendment D.51 submitted by the Government member of Sweden, fell.

252. With no amendments to the introductory part of paragraph 2 nor to subparagraph 2(a), these were adopted.

253. Introducing amendment D.99 to paragraph 2(b) submitted by the Government members of China, Egypt and India, the Government member of Egypt explained that the only intention was to replace the words "participation in" by the words "input into".

254. The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that the new formulation of paragraph 1(c) facilitated acceptance of this amendment. He nevertheless suggested, as he had done earlier, that the word "input" be used in the plural. With these changes, amendment D.99 was adopted as subamended.

255. Amendment D.67 submitted by the Government member of Bangladesh and seconded by the Government member of the United Kingdom, sought to add the words "keeping in view the special needs of the least developed countries" at the end of paragraph 2(c). Explaining the amendment the Government member of Bangladesh stated that nowhere in the world were social conditions so alarming as in the least developed countries. This was recognized in a recent General Assembly resolution 47/92 which called for special attention to be given to these countries. He expressed the hope that this Committee would support a similar view.

256. The Workers' Vice-Chairman indicated that this amendment presented a problem, not as regards its intention with which he could readily agree, but with regard to its insertion in the text of paragraph 2(c). He suggested the matter could be taken up again when discussing amendment D.82 which raised a similar issue.

257. The Government members of India, the United Kingdom and Sudan expressed their support for the amendment. The Government member of the United Kingdom and the Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated support for the proposed amendment but, like the Workers' Vice-Chairman, asked whether it might not be placed in paragraph 2(d). Following some debate, the Government member of Bangladesh accepted to withdraw his amendment on the understanding that the concern it conveyed would be addressed in the subsequent paragraph.

258. On behalf of the co-sponsors, the Government member of Egypt withdrew amendment D.100. The Government member of India likewise withdrew amendment D.101.

259. Amendment D.82, submitted by the Government member of Bulgaria and seconded by the Government members of Germany, Poland and the Russian Federation, sought to add the words "including programmes of transition to a market economy" at the end of paragraph 2(d). The Government member of Bulgaria presented the amendment by stating that his task was greatly facilitated following the consideration of amendment D.67. He conveyed that the intention of his amendment was simply to call attention, as had been done the previous year, to the structural changes taking place in countries moving to a market economy.

260. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested the following reformulation of paragraph 2(d):

> to continue, in this context, to address the social aspects of structural adjustment bearing in mind the problems of countries in transition to a market economy and the particular needs of least developed countries.

261. The Government member of Morocco expressed his support for the subamendment but suggested adding to the end the words "in coordination with international financial institutions". The Government member of Argentina supported the amendments of the Government members of Bangladesh and Bulgaria and suggested for the sake of equity also to include a reference to developing countries in general. The Government members of India and Mexico indicated their support for this suggestion.

262. The Employers' and the Workers' Vice-Chairmen indicated their reservations concerning this latter suggestion. Taking the views expressed into consideration, the Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested a new formulation of his earlier subamendment worded as follows:

> To continue, in this context, to address the social aspects of structural adjustment, bearing in mind the persistent problems of developing countries, and especially the particular needs of least developed countries, as well as the problems of countries in transition to a market economy.

263. This formulation commanded wide support. The earlier suggestion of the Government member of Morocco was not retained. As a result, amendment D.82, as subamended, was adopted. Consequently, amendment D.81, submitted by the Employers' group, fell.

264. The Committee adopted the operative part of the resolution, as amended.

Adoption of the resolution

265. The resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development was adopted, as amended, by consensus.

Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour

Presentation of the resolution

266. On behalf of the sponsoring Workers' delegates, the Workers' member from New Zealand presented the resolution stating that it was the specific responsibility of the ILO to deal with child labour, particularly in this 75th anniversary year. Despite the many social advances recorded since the foundation of the ILO, the exploitation of children continued in many regions of the world. World economic and social change had created a massive impact on working people, but in the debates on this subject children were often forgotten. Growing competition had led to an intensification of low-cost competition, including intensification of child exploitation. The speaker gave two examples of this, first in the growing demand for Australian and New Zealand wool to be used in the manufacture of carpets extensively based on child labour, and second in the expansion of organized tourism in poor countries linked to child prostitution. He recalled the words of the President of the Conference proposing a universal prohibition of labour for children under 14 years and the appropriate regulation of employment of adoloscents aged 14 to 18. He indicated that the resolution aimed to build on the work done by previous ILO conferences and on the initiatives taken by the ILO itself as well as those of other UN agencies. He further stated that the resolution had been sponsored by Workers' delegates from 27 countries and hoped it would command wide support in the Committee.

General discussion

267. The Workers' member from New Zealand explained that the resolution was related to the basic mandate of the ILO. Child workers were not marginalized and discouraged workers. They had never been given proper opportunities nor would many of them ever reach the maturity and physical capacity to be capable of seeking employment as adults. The growth of world trade and of globalization, although not directly linked, had worsened the problem of child labour. The recordable exploitation of under-aged children increased from 56 million in 1979 to 88 million in 1986 and was put at 200 million in the most recent assessment. The speaker asked what could possibly justify this phenomenon? The disaster was of a global nature found in all parts of the world, in both developing and developed countries. He stated that this abuse of the most basic of human rights needed to be energetically opposed through decisive steps towards the final elimination of child labour. The social costs were high as generations were being lost who would not be contributing to their own physical and social development nor to that of their countries. The developed countries needed to accept their share of responsibility. The middle classes were the target market for significant volumes of the products produced by child labour. The speaker explained that the intention of the sponsors was to have a decisive statement by the Conference on this matter on the occasion of the 75th anniversary. He pointed to the main items in the preamble and the operative part of the resolution. Governments were invited to ratify ILO Convention No. 138 as well as actively to discourage the use of child labour. Two new activities were proposed for the ILO beyond those already under way, namely the undertaking of a comprehensive study to identify the extent of the practice and the convening of a world conference on child labour. In concluding he called on all the members of the Committee to lend their support to this resolution.

268. The Employers' Vice-Chairman conveyed the support of his group for the resolution as well as their concern over the issue of child labour. He regretted that the Committee would have no time to discuss it further and hoped there would be another opportunity.

269. On behalf of the IMEC countries, the Government member of the United Kingdom expressed her wholehearted support for this resolution and for the work of the ILO in this field. The resolution called for an end to child bondage and slavery, to child labour in onerous and hazardous conditions and to work by younger children, but was not over-ambitious in its aims in that it had not aimed at an immediate end to all child labour. She noted that, had there been more time to discuss the resolution in detail, it would have been her hope to see it swiftly adopted with only minor amendments. However, as there was no realistic prospect of this, she appealed to the Committee members not to engage in a long debate so that it would be possible to finish the Committee's other urgent business.

270. Speaking for the countries of his region, the Government member of Argentina, whilst conveying his full support for the resolution, doubted whether the Committee would this year be in a position to adopt more than two resolutions.

271. The Government member of India stated that his country was against child labour. India's Constitution called for the protection of children and several labour laws aimed to protect children as well as to achieve the progressive elimination of child labour. However, on the question of the resolution before the Committee, he mentioned that many elements in the resolution caused concern. In this connection, he observed that his Government fully endorsed the 1979 ILC resolution on child labour and this resolution, which spoke about humanizing and regulating child labour with a view to its progressive elimination, was still relevant today. He pointed out that child labour and exploitation were worldwide phenomena, found in varying forms, irrespective of poverty or prosperity, in the developed and developing world. He specifically pointed out the World Labour Report 1992 in this connection where there were important references to child labour in developed countries. Surprisingly, this aspect was prominently absent in the World Labour Report 1993. He went on to add that it was the 1979 resolution that inspired much of the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act of 1986 of India. The Government of India had adopted a multidisciplinary approach to address this issue by eliminating child labour in hazardous employments and regulating child labour in other areas with a view to its progressive elimination. He argued that the call for the immediate elimination of child labour was not pragmatic as it would only cause further distress and would move the practice underground beyond the reach of laws and enforcing agencies. In a vast country like India, such laws could not be easily enforced. He questioned whether child labour should be abolished through sanctions on the international trade of goods produced by child labour. The relative volume of such trade was rather small. In his view, massive social problems such as child labour could not be meaningfully addressed by coercion, in trade or otherwise. More positive measures were required such as investments in universal elementary education, particularly when made relevant to the world of work, awareness campaigns among all concerned, and poverty alleviation programmes providing gainful employment. He concluded that child labour required an integrated approach, combining legislative means and development programmes such as the IPEC programme of the ILO from which his country also benefited.

272. The Government member of China stated that his Government was against child labour and was combating it through legislative and practical means. He expressed his support for the resolution and, if time permitted, would hope to suggest some improvements to the text, in particular as regards increased cooperation and assistance.

273. The Government member of Chile indicated his satisfaction with the resolution.

274. The Workers' Vice-Chairman suggested to the Committee that if there would be no amendments, the resolution could be adopted by consensus. If there were only very few amendments to this draft resolution, which seemed to command broad agreement, the Committee would possibly have time to adopt it.

275. Following a short debate, and after several Government members indicated that they would have amendments to propose to the draft resolution, the Committee decided on this occasion not to set a deadline for the submission of amendments since there would not be time for them to be discussed.

Consideration and adoption of the report

Consideration of the report

276. The Committee considered its draft report at its tenth sitting.

277. Corrections to specific paragraphs were submitted by various members for incorporation in the report.

Adoption of the report

278. At its tenth sitting, the Committee unanimously adopted its report subject to a number of changes.

Geneva, 18 June 1994. (signed) Mr. S. Gopalan,
Chairman and Reporter.

Resolutions submitted to the Conference

Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

On the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia,

Reaffirming the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and which retain their relevance in the world today, including the promotion of social justice as the basis of universal peace,

Reaffirming also that because of its mandate and tripartite structure, the ILO has a unique rôle to play within the UN system,

Noting the particular importance of ILO Conventions covering fundamental rights, including Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 29 and 105, and 111,

Mindful of the provisions contained in paragraph 3 of article 19 of the ILO Constitution,

Recognizing that the world has undergone considerable social and economic changes in recent years and anticipating that these will continue and will have varying effects on different countries,

Considering also that all institutions and structures need to be reviewed from time to time and where necessary strengthened, in order to ensure that their activities remain relevant to the needs of their members in a changing environment,

Acknowledging that structural change profoundly affects the world of work which requires the ILO efficiently to pursue its mandate and objectives concerning social justice, including the promotion of full, freely chosen and productive employment and the continued enhancement of working conditions,

Noting that the Governing Body of the ILO has already taken steps to improve the functioning of the International Labour Conference and the regional conferences, and to improve its own methods of work,

Thanking the Director-General for his Report to the current Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change — Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, and taking note of the ideas and proposals it contains on the ILO's future orientation and activities of the ILO,

Further noting with interest the views expressed in the debate at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, as well as the recent contributions of several governments and of the social partners in the ILO to the discussion of the ILO's future;

1. Calls upon member States, and employers' and workers' organizations to reaffirm the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded and to contribute to a strengthening, where necessary, of the ILO's policy-making structures.
2. Encourages also member States, and employers' and workers' organizations, to work together with a view to a renewal of the means of action of the ILO, and with a view to improving and optimizing the benefits it offers to its constituents in the light of changes in the world.

3. Requests the Director-General, in the light of the views expressed in the debate on his report to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, to present his views on the options available and to facilitate the discussion of these options by the Governing Body.

4. Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office:

   (a) to examine the ideas and proposals of the Director-General with a view to revitalizing further the ILO, adapting its means of action to the changing world environment and increasing its effectiveness;

   (b) to keep the Conference informed of the outcome.

Resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Welcoming the convening by the United Nations General Assembly of the World Summit for Social Development in Denmark in 1995,

Considering the vital importance of peace, economic growth and social justice as the essential components necessary for social development,

Underlining the critical importance for the expansion of full, freely chosen and productive employment, reduction of unemployment, reduction and elimination of poverty and promotion of social integration, which have been chosen as the Summit's core issues,

Considering that the social and living conditions of people become particularly vulnerable during periods of profound structural change,

Convinced that economic efficiency and growth, and their interaction with adequate social protection, are important prerequisites for successful national development, and that economic reforms should also lead to sustainable social progress,

Mindful of the need to address the social consequences that may arise from structural adjustment policies including those promoted by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank,

Recognizing the importance of international cooperation to support and complement national efforts to promote social development,

Recognizing the urgent need for a major initiative by the international community to tackle global social problems, and the opportunity that the Summit offers for the preparation of an appropriate comprehensive programme of action for the United Nations system,

Considering that issues to be examined by the Summit are central to the mandate and the competence of the ILO,

Considering therefore that the ILO has a primary responsibility and role to play in the preparation and conduct of the Summit and in the consideration and implementation of the conclusions which fall within its competence,

Stressing the need for appropriate tripartite inputs at all stages of the Summit process,

Also stressing the importance of the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, as appropriate, in the development of policies for economic growth and employment generation which will contribute to the strengthening of social protection systems, especially for the most vulnerable groups of the populations,

Noting the work of the Governing Body Working Party on the World Summit for Social Development and the inputs by the ILO Secretariat to the Summit preparation,

Also noting that discussions took place at the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment held on 10 June 1994 on issues to be addressed in connection with the Summit;

1. Invites all member States, and where appropriate, workers' and employers' organizations:
   - (a) to prepare for the World Summit for Social Development taking into consideration the competence, mandate and work of the ILO;
   - (b) to adopt and implement a declaration and a programme of action which should effectively address the issues of expansion of productive employment and reduction of unemployment, reduction and elimination of poverty and promotion of social integration;
   - (c) to promote the appropriate involvement of employers' and workers' organizations in the preparations for, conduct of, and follow-up to the Summit by:
     - (i) involving employers' and workers' organizations in the national preparations for the Summit;
     - (ii) considering including representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as advisers in the national delegations to the Summit;
     - (iii) considering the practical arrangements for an active participation by the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations at the Summit;
   - (d) to recognize the primary competence of the ILO regarding core themes in the preparation for, conduct of and follow-up to the Summit;
   - (e) to strengthen the active participation of workers' and employers' organizations in the formulation of follow-up action to deal with the issues arising out of the Summit.
2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General:
   - (a) to continue to make the necessary provisions for a full ILO input to the Summit process;
   - (b) to take all opportunities to promote tripartite inputs to that process;
   - (c) to take fully into account the need for the ILO to play a leading role in the follow-up to the Summit when preparing the programme and budget proposals for 1996-97 and in convening the second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment;
   - (d) to continue, in this context, to address the problems of structural adjustment, bearing in mind the persistent problems of developing countries, and especially the particular needs of the least developed countries, as well as the problems of countries in transition to a market economy.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

Eighty-first Session, Geneva, 1994

Twentieth sitting

Monday, 20 June 1994, 10 a.m.

Presidents: Mr. Gray, Mr. Ould Sidi

FIRST REPORT OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, contained in Provisional Record No. 15.

I call upon Mrs. Zhang, Government adviser, China, Chairperson and Reporter of the Finance Committee, to submit the report.

Mrs. ZHANG (Government adviser, China; Chairperson and Reporter of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. This report, circulated as Provisional Record No. 15, contains the Committee's discussion on all the matters it considered, and the resolutions recommended for adoption by the Conference appear just before the Appendices at the end of the report.

The first item before the Committee was an information paper showing the status of collection of member States' contributions at the end of May. The Treasurer informed the Committee that, with the addition of amounts received since then, the total for 1994 contributions received at 14 June 1994 was just over 144 million Swiss francs.

The second and third items were considered together. The first dealt with the rates of assessment of a number of new member States: Georgia, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, Eritrea, the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Oman and South Africa; while the second proposed a scale of assessments for member States' contributions for 1995. Resolutions concerning both these matters were adopted by the Committee for submission to the Conference.

The fourth and fifth items dealt with by the Committee concerned arrangements for amounts due from Viet Nam and Albania. The resolutions submitted to the Conference are required because of the amendment to the Financial Regulations, which was approved by the Conference in 1993.

The Committee also considered the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1992-93 and recommends them to the Conference for adoption.

The next question was the treatment of the 1992-93 cash surplus. The Committee agreed to the recommendations of the Governing Body concerning the appropriations from this surplus described in Appendix II. This will still leave a refund to member States of the remainder of the cash surplus, amounting to just over 2.5 million Swiss francs.

The next matter considered by the Committee concerned an amount received from a company contracted to carry out maintenance work on the ILO headquarters building. The resolution adopted for submission to the Conference proposes that this amount be paid into the Building and Accommodation Fund for the maintenance of technical installations in the headquarters building.

The Committee also adopted for submission to the Conference a resolution concerning the terms of office of the three judges of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization. This was the last item of business for the Committee.

To conclude, I would like to express my thanks to the Vice-Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Samuel Randiga, Government delegate of Kenya, to all members of the Committee for their attendance and active participation in our work, and to the members of the secretariat; all of them helped me greatly in my task as Chairman.

I would commend all these resolutions to the Conference for adoption, and I hope you will give them your unanimous support.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Miss MACKIE (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) – I first wish to extend my congratulations and my support to the President and his Vice-Presidents.

Concerning the programme and budget and other financial questions, this agenda item does not often give rise to much discussion and yet the International Labour Conference is the final authority of the ILO and must be ultimately responsible for all its work, its structures and its reputation. We have two financial reports before us.

I have the honour to act as spokesperson for the Employers' group on the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body. Before I go any further, I should like to state very clearly that although I have some criticisms to make, none relates in any way to the integrity, motivation or, indeed, hard work of the Director-General or any of his staff, with whom I have, and hope to maintain, a working relationship in which they have been unfailingly patient and helpful.

Concerning the financial report and audited financial statements, apart from a recommendation that it should be adopted, there are no comments from the Governing Body, whose procedures currently do not permit discussion of reports made by its own committees. However, it is an important report and in particular the value and significance of the work done and the recommendations made by the External Auditor and his staff should not be overlooked. We have suggested that a small group might be set up for this purpose.

Concerning the treatment of the 1992-93 cash surplus, the Employers' group of the Governing Body supported the proposal now being made to the Conference on this matter, but remains concerned about a number of issues which arise from it, including the continued applicability of article 18 of the Financial Regulations. We hope that the Governing Body will return to these issues.

Concerning "zero real growth budgets", the governments of member States deserve a clear message of appreciation from this Conference for the strength of their financial support to the ILO. They have continued, for the past four biennia, to accept "zero real growth" budgeting. Any industrial or commercial organization which was able to count on such a commitment, especially during these past years of economic troubles, would have recognized that it was outstandingly fortunate and few public or private organizations of any kind can have experienced such stability.

However, the Director-General has referred to zero growth, critically, twice in circumstances reported in Report II now before us. On page 36, referring to proposals omitted from the budget of 1992-93, I quote: "However, the constraints of zero growth did not enable us to maintain them in the budget at that time. But it is obvious that by dint of concentrating the bulk of our resources on meeting the requests of member States, we have been forced to delay spending on certain maintenance and renovation costs which must imperatively be incurred, if we are not to witness a deterioration of the working tool of the Office."

Later, on page 43, I quote again: "The constraint of zero real growth over the last four biennia, coupled with repeated programme reduction exercises, has hindered the renovation of ILO external offices and the modernization of their stock of equipment and furniture."

It is not for the Governing Body to become involved with the detailed management of the Office. However, I am left with some real anxieties. We all rely upon the existence of the ILO offices, efficiently maintained with reasonably up-to-date technical equipment. Only on that assumption can programme priorities be sensibly discussed.

When the Director-General implies that fundamental needs are being disregarded in order to comply with the requests of member States, it is alarming. Perhaps it would not be, had the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee been regularly made aware of any significant expenditure which the Director-General had felt obliged to defer in response to budgetary constraints. I hope he will provide such information in future, and that he will in any event feel encouraged to advise the Governing Body very strongly against the adoption of such programme priorities when, in his judgement, the result would be a deterioration, such as he referred to in the first passage I quoted.

The other course which we would most strongly recommend is that the ILO should follow the example, painful though it may be, of so many of its constituent members, and undertake a programme of streamlining procedures, cutting administrative costs and increasing productivity. I hear in the corridors that a varied range of steps has already been taken in this direction, but it does not seem entirely appropriate for the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee to suspend its critical faculties on the basis of such unofficial information. If indeed action has been taken, there is ample evidence that there is scope for more. It is unacceptable that the Governing Body and the Conference should be constrained and limited in a cost-saving exercise while the Office retains staffing levels and personnel policies more suitable for the days of its founding 75 years ago.

I complimented the member States a few minutes ago, but unfortunately not all subscriptions are paid when they are due: that is a different issue. The Employers' group has for many years argued that a penalty should be imposed for late payment, a practice by no means unknown in international bodies. The present incentive bonus scheme has now been given a reasonable trial, and experience to date seems to indicate that its advantages are small and outweighed by its costs.

Let me turn now to the work of the governing body and the conference. As you know, following a review of the work of the Governing Body and the programme of the Conference itself, both have embarked on a trial period of reduced meetings, mainly to reduce costs. It is much too early to assess this trial, and I mention it now only to remind delegates that it is a trial and that their experience of it should be part of the evaluation which the Governing Body will be making at a later date.

I want to turn now to consideration and approval of the Programme and Budget, and I hope that the Governing Body will not wait for its financial evaluation of the changes before deciding that it should also consider the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the extent to which it is currently able to do effective work.

Next year, this Conference will have the proposed Programme and Budget for 1996-97 before it. That document will represent months of work for every department and office in the ILO, but when the Governing Body receives a report on it from its Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee, that Committee will have had some difficulty finding an appropriate time to discuss it.

Part of the problem is unique to this year. The Preliminary Consultation Paper on the 1996-97 Programme and Budget was presented during the March Governing Body meeting, but clearly the special nature of the debate on the Director-General's Report in this anniversary year meant that the Governing Body's discussion of that paper would inevitably be overtaken by the Conference debate.

However, assuming that the proposed changes have come to stay, it should be noted that we must adapt further in order to make things work effectively. In non-budget years the report of the March session of the Governing Body on its discussion of the Preliminary Consultation on the Budget must somehow be approved so that it can come to the Conference in June. In budget years the March session of the Governing Body will need adequate time to discuss the Programme and Budget proposals, but that discussion will also have to take place early enough for any proposed changes and for the report on the discussion to be incorporated in the final documents which are due to be sent to member States in the first week of April. There may be a cost-effective solution to be found in the use of some form of small working group, but that has yet to be discussed.

All of this amounts to an indigestible amount of procedural detail, for which I apologize to the President and to anyone else who is still listening. My excuse is very simple. I personally believe wholeheartedly in the value of the ILO and the work it does. It is needed, and it must do its work efficiently, democratically, and in accordance with its own Constitution and its various rules and procedures. A Governing Body which meets twice a year cannot provide the Director-General with the guidance and leadership which he is entitled to expect, but it must nevertheless take full responsibility for the results. No doubt various methods of solving this problem will be tried; thank you for allowing me to try the method of raising some unusually detailed issues here, under the second item of the Conference agenda.

The PRESIDENT – If there are no further requests for the floor, we shall move on to the adoption of the report.

The adoption of the report entails the adoption of the report itself, that is paragraphs 1 to 24, as well as the resolutions appended to it, namely the resolutions concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States, the resolution concerning the scale of assessment of contributions for 1995, the resolution concerning an arrangement for the settlement of amounts due by Viet Nam, the resolution concerning an arrangement for the settlement of amounts due by Albania, the resolution concerning the Financial Report and Audited Financial Statements for 1992-93, the resolution concerning the treatment of the 1992-93 cash surplus, the resolution concerning the treatment of the amount received from the Compagnie Générale de Climatisation et de Maintenance, and the resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization.

If there are no objections, may I take it that the report and the eight resolutions are adopted?

(The report and the eight resolutions are adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the other members of the Committee and the secretariat for the excellent work they have done.

SECOND REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT – We shall now move on to consider the second report of the Credentials Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Spencer, Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago, Chairman of the Committee, to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. SPENCER (Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – The second report of the Credentials Committee is published at the end of Provisional Record No. 14. It contains the Committee's conclusions and three objections, lodged in accordance with article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. They were in each case against the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the country concerned. In one case, the Committee found the objection not to be receivable as its author later accepted nomination as adviser in the Workers' delegation, and advisers cannot object to the credentials of the delegate to whom they are attached.

Another case concerned the action to be taken by Governments when the most representative organizations cannot agree on the composition of the delegations to the Conference. Two meetings had been arranged between the organizations, and different proposals were made. The Government acted on one of them. The Committee did not uphold the objection, but felt that more could perhaps have been done to obtain full agreement. Where a government receives different proposals, a decision should normally be made in favour of the proposal that comes from the most representative organization or organizations. The problem in this case is that the Government did not have the necessary data for assessing the representative character of the organizations.

This was also the main problem in the third case considered. On the absence of information of representative character, the Committee did not uphold the objection.

The Committee also discussed the questions concerning credentials in general and the appointment of substitute delegates. There was a difference of opinion in the Committee as to whether or not too many advisers were being appointed as substitute delegates. It was, however, felt that the forms for credentials that are sent to governments could be made clearer with respect to substitute delegates.

Finally, the Committee had to take a decision on a matter that had been dealt with at length by the Credentials Committee last year. A communication setting out the composition of the delegation of Zaire was received on behalf of the "Gouvernement de Transition". For the reasons given last year, the Committee was unable to treat this communication as credentials.

I should like to draw special attention to the list annexed to the Committee's report. It gives the numbers of delegates and advisers who are registered and still present at the Conference at the time the report was established, last Thursday. This list is not just for the information of delegations. I would suggest that each delegation look at the entry relating to itself and bring any discrepancies to the attention of the secretariat of the Credentials Committee. In this way, account can be taken of departures that have not been notified to the secretariat, as well as certain cases in which a delegate or other person entitled to vote does not yet appear in the database. Errors in quorum or voting rights can thus be avoided.

The PRESIDENT – Since this report was adopted unanimously by the Credentials Committee, I invite the Conference to take note of it.

(The report is noted).

The PRESIDENT – I should like to thank the Chairman and the Officers of the Committee for the excellent report they have presented to us.

The PRESIDENT – We will now resume our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. AGYEI (Workers' delegate, Ghana) – May I join all previous speakers in congratulating the President, on his election to the Chair of this important and memorable session which marks the 75th anniversary of the founding of this Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I also bring to you, and to the whole Conference in session, the fraternal greetings and best wishes of the Executive Board of the Ghana Trades Union Congress on this historic and memorable occasion, and reaffirm the belief of the working people of Ghana in social justice as one of the fundamental values of the International Labour Organization and its determination to further its cause.

The last 75 years have witnessed the birth and sustained growth of the International Labour Organization with its enormous changes following the political and economic transformation in the world.

The Director-General in his Report to this 81st Session states that a great deal of progress and stability in various fields have been achieved over the past 75 years. While agreeing that the ILO in its 75 years of existence can recount some significant successes in the pursuit of its mandate of promoting social justice and better working conditions, a lot more remains to be done in the area of upholding and strengthening international labour standards.

It is becoming increasingly evident that globalization and a policy of ultra-liberalization of economies of the Third World are posing great threats to the relevance of international labour standards. In this regard, it is pertinent to caution that the soft-law approach, as envisaged in the Director-General's Report, will have a negative effect on the application of these standards, thus rendering new standard-setting activities of the ILO insignificant to the detriment of the world of work.

To workers in the developing countries, I have to exhort you that no price is too much to pay and no sacrifices too much to make for the achievement of universality of international labour standards.

We recognize the enormous responsibility of the International Labour Organization in its work for the attainment of its lofty ideals and pray that it continues with its fight for regulation of hours of work; achievement of full employment and raising standards of living; provision of relevant minimum wage to all; recognition of the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value; recognition of the principle of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining; provision of child welfare and maternity protection; protection of the interests of workers employed in countries other than their own; and the organization of vocational and technical education in conditions of equal opportunity.

The tripartite structure of the International Labour Organization is unique in the United Nations family. This tripartism must be reinforced everywhere and its scope expanded to serve as a forum for consultation on all social and economic issues. It is imperative for all social partners to act together in order to strengthen and sustain the practice of tripartism at international and national levels. In my country, the tripartite forum is helping to promote an enabling industrial atmosphere, which is a prerequisite for our economic recovery effort, even though there is considerable room for improvement.

We believe that dialogue and negotiations are the best means of bringing about the consensus that the social partners need in the promotion and sustenance of free collective bargaining and other related issues.

Tripartism, which has been tried and found effective in many countries of the North, at both local, regional and national levels, should be encouraged and strengthened in the South. In this respect, the ILO's strengthening of its field structures and of the multidisciplinary advisory teams which have been established should have, as its main thrust, educational programmes geared towards providing training and practical experience in the techniques of social dialogue and negotiations.

The Ghana Trades Union Congress dedicated its May Day celebrations to the ILO and the good work of its founding fathers. The theme of our celebrations was "International labour standards – Basis for socio-economic growth". During the period, focus was concentrated on the International Labour Organization and its impact on Ghanaian workers. This brought to the fore the shortcomings of our economic programme, especially the social dimensions of the Structural Adjustment Programme of the Government of Ghana.

The past years saw evidence of the onslaught on workers' rights in our country. Without our collective zeal, many of our retrenched members would have been denied their just entitlements. There are other labour issues pending, to be addressed by the Government of Ghana, and it is our hope that it will be guided by the vision of the founding people of this Organization, to enable Ghana to maintain and defend the values workers have achieved over the years with the aim of promoting change for peace and good governance.

I submit that governments must move away from merely lamenting the scale of poverty, disease and squalor to which peoples of developing countries are exposed, and begin to formulate and implement positive policies which will alleviate these dehumanizing conditions.

The Declaration of Philadelphia, whose 50th anniversary we are celebrating, should be a constant reminder to the privileged in society that time is not on their side; therefore, public authorities should take the initiative and act decisively to remove the danger which our continued poverty poses to their prosperity.

Finally, let me once again, on behalf of the working people of Ghana, congratulate the ILO on this occasion, and wish it many happy anniversaries in the years ahead.

Original Arabic: Mr. ABDOUN (Workers' delegate, Sudan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I wish to extend warm congratulations to the President and his Officers on their election to conduct the proceedings of this Conference, in particular the President, who comes from the workers' ranks and, despite the fact that we tend to hold divergent views, is a member of the working class and comes from a country replete with resources and skills. He himself is among the most competent representatives of the workers of the world and secured the unanimous confidence of the Conference.

I should first like to compliment the people of South Africa on their victory over apartheid and I wish them success in their choice of non-racist democracy. I pray God to assist the people of Palestine in recovering their land and establishing their independent State with its capital in the Holy City of Jerusalem.

We are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia at this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in the year 1994. On my own behalf and on behalf of the Sudan Workers Trade Union Federation, I have pleasure in extending warm congratulations to you all on this happy occasion. I wish to thank the Director-General for his Report to this session entitled Defending values, promoting change. I shall focus my discussion on a passage in the Report, which reads as follows: "In addition, we are now witnessing a drastic acceleration in the globalization of the economy. This process, which is a source of hope for some and of distress for others, a positive development for some and a dangerous drift for others, is calling a number of concepts and fixed ideas into question. Let us not delude ourselves into thinking that our Organization can avoid making a thorough analysis of such a transformation."

We must reassert the urgent need for the continued existence of the International Labour Organization to defend employment and workers' rights, to bring about social peace and amicable understanding between the three social partners in the interests of stability in every country of the world, to establish justice and tranquillity between the different sectors of society and to prevent war so that the world can live in unruffled peace. The ILO could play a full and effective role if it could free itself from the stranglehold of the imperialist countries. We say this because of a practice that makes us apprehensive that our Organization, on which we have pinned our hopes and which was created by our predecessors to protect us from the evils of war and destruction, is slipping away from us. Our experience with the ILO in Sudan gives us the impression that it has fallen under the control of the great powers, losing the qualities of neutrality, professionalism and expertise that enabled it to rise above the mentality of the powerful and evil. We, the workers of Sudan, hope that the ILO will cast off the political influence of the colonialist States and reassert its independence, drawing on its principles to pursue the goals for which it was established along the right and just path.

For the ILO, any discussion of values and promoting change should imply refusing double standards based on the interests of the rich countries, which control both politics and the economy and impose their will by political, economic and military force without concern for peoples' sovereignty over their own countries and their freedom of choice. We want the ILO to support the poor countries against the rich, who are responsible for their oppressive burden of debt based on injustice and on inhumane policies associated with the crisis and the imbalance between the exports of the poor countries and the imports of the rich. We want it to resist the adverse impact of the so-called market economy and structural adjustment, a capitalist trend that ignores social rights, and to urge the international financial institutions to refrain from imposing harsh conditions that are incompatible with the principles of social justice. We urge it to avoid aligning itself with theories of so-called economic liberalism, which lead to economic and social chaos in the Third World, making the rich richer and the poor poorer and exacerbating unemployment, deprivation and oppression. The ILO should remind the rich colonialist countries that it was they who exploited the resources of the countries that are now demanding cancellation of their debt.

With regard to international labour standards, the workers of Sudan adhere to existing international labour instruments and demand the implementation of freedom of association in the framework of a united regional trade union movement, warning against the danger of trade union pluralism, which has turned into political opportunism. We say to those who advocate trade union pluralism as a form of freedom that it is really a form of division. The unity to which we aspire under the protection of international labour standards is not liable to fall under the control of autocratic national political regimes. What we want is a united national trade union movement that is free and independent, not of its countries but in terms of its national and democratic practice and behaviour. As far as we are concerned, we continue to defend values and encourage change for the well-being of humanity. The ILO should begin now to make available its technical assistance, without discrimination or racism, to those who deserve it, for example the continent of Africa, which needs it most urgently of all.

In conclusion, I should like to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and to the Governing Body and to the staff for their devotion to the service of the community of labour and workers. Although there are certain shortcomings to which we wished to draw attention, we admit that perfection lies with Almighty God alone. It was this year's Report that encouraged us to make our views known in the hope that God will help us to find the right path towards the welfare of humanity.

Original German: Mr. HESOUN (Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, Austria) – On 10 May of this year in Vienna, in a worthy setting and in the presence of the federal Government and representatives of workers and employers, we celebrated the anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

On this occasion, the Federal Chancellor, Mr. Franz Vranitzky, reminded us that Austria, by its social legislation and the changes made in the status of workers within the undertaking, was one of the very first countries to give effect to the basic principles of the ILO. Firstly, we have recognized the fact that economic development and social progress are not contradictory, but complementary and interdependent. Secondly, everybody recognizes that cooperation has to take priority over conflict and must be used as a means to a better future.

In applying these principles the ILO did all countries a truly invaluable service. The ILO is a body which demonstrates that tripartism (i.e. employers, workers and governments together) in social policy, and can lead to success. With no great recourse to publicity or advertising, it has contributed to the success of Austrian social and economic policy.

The ILO rightly uses its internationally recognized status to point to the roots of dangerous economic and social trends. Today, at a time when the international contradictions appear in new and unexpected forms, this task is more topical, relevant and more important than ever before. In Austria, we have steadily improved our social policy. We have to persevere in this, so as to maintain awareness of solidarity in society and in politics. Thus, in the field of social security as well as in the broader field of labour market policy, we have managed to produce higher and, at the same time, more flexible standards. Thus, for instance, we can react swiftly and efficiently to structural changes in the European labour market.

Our budgetary resources are allocated above all to the improvement of workers' qualifications. Experience has shown, and international tendencies bear this out, that social security – also in the labour market – can only be ensured if each individual is given the opportunity to use his own initiative in a context of greater flexibility.

Our active labour market policy follows this principle and has done so with great success. We have managed to enable a high percentage of problem groups – long-term unemployed, older workers and unemployed young people – to enter or re-enter the labour market. Our basic principle is that there should be greater self-determination in the social field, for we strive to ensure that proper values should be given to the individual who must not be treated as a commodity. Social policy should not be just a piece of welfare machinery, but a partner with human beings in the world of labour, which is in the process of radical change.

Our active labour market policy, which has been stepped up in the last few years, has led to an unemployment rate of 4.5 per cent, which is the second lowest in the whole of Europe. In the last few years, we have given special importance to the needs and aspirations of the older workers. Thus, since last year we have had a medical care allowance, financed equally by workers and employers. This joint financing ensures a dignified and independent existence for some 400,000 people in need of care. We are continually being told – and this has been confirmed – what a pioneering job we have done with this legislation. Through a major pension reform, standardizing existing social security systems and taking the entire working life into account in the calculation of benefits we have ensured a more just provision for old age. Financing for this guaranteed well beyond the year 2000.

Conscious of our pioneering position in Europe, we have recently enacted a worker protection law with a new set of safety standards and a broad occupational health coverage of the most advanced type. These major achievements in the last few years enable us to look with confidence to a united European future.

Original Spanish: Mr. GUTIERREZ (Workers' delegate, El Salvador) – Since the signing of the peace agreement, the trade union movement of El Salvador has had high hopes for its continued development and for progress in the attainment and defence of trade union rights, labour rights and economic and social rights for the working class. The unions had to bear their share of the sacrifices during the civil war which lasted more than 12 years, and trusted that the peace agreement would finally help create and strengthen working methods conducive to social peace and harmony.

With this vision, we insisted that the Economic and Social Concertation Forum begin its work and have an effect in the interests of a civil society which previously had to face militarism and a lack of democracy and social justice.

More than two years after the signing of the peace agreement, our working class is struggling for its survival. Instead of strengthening the economic and social development of our people and taking into account the workers, the economic and social policies that are being pursued seek to divide the trade union movement, or worse, to eliminate it.

These neo-liberal economic policies which have been (and are still being) applied in our country have hit the working class hard. It has defended its interests, seeking the equity and social justice which it lacked in the past. Their absence led to the war. But the efforts of the working class have been insufficient. The gap has widened between the ideal of common welfare and the wealth of a privileged few to the detriment of many.

I would now like to speak about the present situation of the workers in El Salvador. The Economic and Social Concertation Forum, which was established by the peace agreement, did not result in equity for workers. The most progress it made in more than a year of existence was to discuss a working agenda and a framework agreement of principles and commitments. These did not result in more positive elements in practice. It also discussed international standards. Since our country is one of the country which have ratified the lowest number of Conventions – a total of six – the workers submitted for discussion approximately 30 Conventions, which have still not been ratified by the Government of El Salvador.

We also discussed the revision of our labour legislation. Since no significant progress was being made, it was suggested that an ILO expert should stimulate the discussion. Mr. Arturo Bronstein drew up a proposal, which left the forum deadlocked. The Government chose unilaterally to proceed with a reform directly in the legislative assembly. This reform has to this day caused disagreement among the parties concerned. As for the situation as it now stands, the forum has not met since December 1993 as the employers unilaterally decided to stop it from meeting because of the recent elections.

In our country trade union rights continue to be neglected. The employers and the Government do not wish to give broad recognition to the right to organize or to permit public sector employees to unionize or negotiate collectively. I may refer to the fact that the reforms to articles 47 and 221 of the El Salvadorian Constitution were not carried out, thus restricting the agenda for discussion.

Workers continue to be dismissed when they try to organize trade unions in enterprises or industries. The organization of trade unions is not allowed in production companies in export processing zones.

The right to collective bargaining is still violated, giving rise to anti-trade union measures and a loss of job security. The conciliation cases brought by or before the Ministry of Labour to seek fair solutions to the problem of the violation of trade union rights continue to be dismissed out of hand by the employers' sector.

"Solidarista" organizations are still being set up with a view to dividing the trade union movement. This is a latent threat to international standards, to the rights of trade unions and to freedom of association. The structural adjustment programmes which have been imposed have compounded the problem, as the trade unions are the main obstacle to the implementation of their economic measures and to privatization. That is why the neo-liberalists have declared war on trade unionism, and that is also why we in the trade unions will do everything necessary to block the application of policies which will lead to more poverty for our people.

In the light of the marginalization of the working class, which prevents it from acting in favour of concertation and negotiation in the various economic, labour and social interests of the workers, we should like clearly to call for the ILO to concentrate on maintaining the basic mandate of the ILO, which is to promote social justice, to strengthen the rights of the workers and to improve their working conditions, and to defend the mandate from attempts to depart from it.

We reject any attempt to undermine or detract from tripartism in the ILO's structures through the incorporation of other social actors.

We reaffirm the importance of the role of international standards and of the supervisory machinery as fundamental activities of the ILO to achieve its fundamental objectives.

We request renewed initiative of the ILO to promote the social development of our peoples. Development strategies must include the participation of the workers and must be committed to meeting the basic needs of the population and to bringing about full employment as a priority objective of economic and social policy.

The ILO should promote mechanisms which establish a direct relationship between trade privileges and the respect of workers' rights so that workers fully share the benefits of the expansion of trade and economic growth, and so that their living conditions improve.

Finally, we believe that the presence and participation of workers' representatives here today reflects a democratic choice made in accordance with the standards of the ILO. May genuine tripartism, with legitimate representation of each of the parties, take hold in El Salvador as well.

Original German: Mr. THIEL (representative, International Social Security Association) – I am particularly honoured to be addressing this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, as representative of the International Social Security Association (ISSA), when the ILO is commemorating its 75th anniversary.

Allow me to offer a few reflections on the occasion of this anniversary.

Seventy-five years are a very long time; and these particular 75 years have been marked by quite extraordinary events and changes. When we consider the whole of human history, this period appears quite differently. Long periods of time appear exceedingly short: if we assume that human history started 24 hours ago Socrates lived just a fraction of a second, two minutes before the end of these 24 hours. The motor car was invented three seconds before midnight.

Since these developments, only fractions of a second have elapsed. But what extraordinary developments and changes we have witnessed in that time!

In the last few years we have witnessed the most dramatic, political and economic changes. At the same time Chernobyl and other catastrophes have made us dramatically aware that prevention must be the most important feature of our future action.

These catastrophes have had dramatic repercussions for local people, for the people of the country concerned, for neighbouring countries and for the entire world; and they know no national frontiers, they are international. Furthermore, the only factor differentiating catastrophes and accidents is the extent of their effects. At times, whole regions and, indeed, continents may be affected; at other times, the damages may be purely local. But all these events affect the life and health of people. Hence prevention is of vital importance for the future health of our world and its inhabitants.

Prevention is also the reason for the existence and continued existence of the ISSA: it was born out of necessity and will continue to be needed in the future. The ISSA is proud and also grateful that the ILO was and remains ready to offer it accommodation, thus providing it with a base for its successful activities. Hence, in this anniversary year, we should like to thank the ILO for its past assistance, and we pledge to continue striving for our objectives, which also coincide with the ILO's aims in the future. A few short steps have to be taken which can only be completed in common and at the international level.

The ISSA has many strings to its bow. It has a network of more than 300 member organizations in more than 120 countries throughout the world. A large number of highly specialized experts are assembled in ten standing expert committees, to meet the demands of our time for better social security and protection at international level. Numerous working groups within these expert committees are currently tackling topical problems and devising concrete and practical solutions – and indeed instructions for putting them into effect.

The ever-increasing pace of technical development has resulted in our world, although big, becoming very small. Nevertheless, it remains fragile. Our world and its population must be protected by these technical achievements. We therefore need to provide prevention in the widest sense – and this can only be achieved by international coordination and regulated by international action. No country in the world can, because of time and financial constraints, take up this challenge in isolation.

Hence, we must not go back and try to reinvent the wheel. Existing achievements must be made use of and new ideas supported.

In this connection, I should like, on behalf of the ISSA, to congratulate Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General, on his outstanding Report on the theme Defending values, promoting change. He comprehensively analyses the future action we need to take. On behalf of the ISSA, I should like to say that we fully support his ideas; and now allow me briefly to mention what measures we in the ISSA are proposing to take.

Under the President of the ISSA, Mr. Sherman, who is strongly supported by the Secretary-General, Mr. Hoskins, we are planning to make prevention the main item on our agenda over the next few years. In drawing up a programme, of course, the experience acquired in this field by member States will certainly be an essential point of departure. Thanks to decades of work by the respective institutions, the accident rate in enterprises has sharply declined.

The distribution of accidents has changed alongside changes in economic and social trends. Out of 100 accidents, only seven occur at the workplace; whereas 37 occur in traffic accidents and 56 in the home and during leisure time. Thus, activities concerned with accident prevention at the workplace must also – as I already said for financial reasons and because of time constraints – involve prevention during workers' transport to and from work and during their leisure time.

Apart from these specific areas, the ISSA will turn its attention increasingly to regional problems of prevention. The active support of individual countries and regions must be improved still further. Of particular significance are world congresses – jointly organized with the ILO – as well as workshops, seminars and round tables. They allow us to define actual problems and swiftly reach appropriate solutions. This work will continue to be important in the future.

Allow me, finally, to refer briefly to the economic components of prevention. International studies have clearly shown that an investment in safety is repaid three times over by economic gains. Thus, US$1 invested in safety today means a gain of US$3 tomorrow.

An anniversary such as this always gives us an opportunity to draw up a balance sheet and think of the future. From the point of view of the ISSA, the balance sheet is very positive; but consider it of the utmost importance for the future to coordinate prevention in all branches at international level. This must be our major concern.

I would like to end by referring to Schopenhauer who believed that health and safety were not everything, but without them we did not have anything at all.

Original French: Mr. CAMARA (Government delegate, Guinea) – First of all I should like to express the sincere congratulations of my delegation to the President as well as his Vice-Presidents upon their election within our Conference.

On behalf of the Government of the Republic of Guinea I should also like to warmly welcome all delegations present at this historic session which commemorates at the same time the 75th anniversary of our Organization, the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the readmission of the Republic of South Africa.

Finally, I should like to congratulate and thank the Director-General of the ILO for his excellent Report entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda, a report which calls upon the ILO constituents to reflect upon the future of their Organization.

My delegation fully shares the ideas contained in this Report and would like to emphasize the absolute necessity to fight for more solidarity and justice in international economic relations.

The world in which we live is characterized by a rocketing acceleration in trade promoted by technical and technological innovation as well as unprecedented growth in communications.

This world is unfortunately also characterized by a lack of equality in development, with the powerful economies becoming ever stronger and the others going through increasingly difficult situations and becoming increasingly precarious.

These inequalities between countries are growing so quickly that they are rapidly marginalizing entire countries within the international economic system, and more and more people within these countries.

My delegation also remains convinced that this competition between economies of unequal strength will inevitably widen the gap separating the rick from the poor countries unless true concertation is established among partners to form a framework for implementation of the GATT agreements.

The African region more particularly is going through an unnerving period which has virtually relegated it to the sidelines of trade expansion; weak links between very restricted national markets, a slow-down in the inflow of capital and foreign investments, the burden of foreign debt, a deficit in the terms of trade etc., against a background of natural disasters, unforeseeable variations in climate and social and political strife.

However, this dramatic situation in the African region must be solved by joint efforts between Africans themselves and the international community acting with greater solidarity in illustration of the statement from the Declaration of Philadelphia that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

In our opinion, the search for global solutions to unequal development must come through a realization of the real interdependence between nations and, for Africa, by implementing a series of measures including solving the debt problem, making due allowance for human and social factors in structural adjustment programmes, and an increase in raw material prices.

Better still would be to devise and launch a new Marshall Plan modelled on the programme applied to Western Europe after the Second World War and the programme set up for the former communist countries of Eastern Europe. To us, this seems the way to provide African countries with the capabilities they need to better participate in economic and social development.

My delegation remains convinced that our Organization, with its tripartite structure and its long and rich experience, can and must undertake action in this sphere to reduce poverty by making even wiser use of the whole range of its activities and, in particular, those related to training and employment, on the one hand, and by the preparation of ever-more appropriate international standards, on the other.

In the meantime, my delegation is pleased to inform this august assembly that Guinea, while improving the legal framework of its liberal law-respecting State, continues its development efforts and the creation of democratic institutions and consultative bodies so as to promote and accelerate harmonious social and economic development: this has been done, to start with, by the organization of its first democratic presidential elections in December 1993 and the preparation of legislative elections for the second half of this year.

At the same time, in economics, private enterprise has been freed up and encouraged to operate in all socio-economic fields, on an individual basis in conjunction with economic agents, organizations or in partnership with local committees so as to raise the standards of infrastructure and services and thus enhance the lives and working conditions of the population: expansion of the paved road network, intensive construction of rural tracks, extension and modernization of educational, water-treatment and water-supply infrastructures in urban centres combined with a programme to install water-standpipes in villages and rural districts, etc.

At the same time, dialogue and continued negotiations with workers' organizations in undertakings in urban areas have proved successful in limiting tensions and conflicts that may occur.

These elements of real progress against a background of social peace and a calm political climate justify the move to more democratic dialogue and the participation of all social and political agents in efforts to augment the overall positive results of economic reform measures and to prepare more equitable distribution of resources.

We should also mention the precious use made of ILO standards in the socio-professional sphere. Guinea has already ratified some 50 of these and continues to support the preparation of new standards, their wider dissemination and, where necessary, the updating of existing standards.

The preparation and strengthening of rules of social justice – which is a characteristic feature of the ILO – should be maintained and developed, especially in these times of deregulation, in order to guarantee our Organization a leading position among international decision-making bodies where it can keep a constant watch on human social capital.

With this end in view, the ILO should acquire the operating rules and human resources it needs to promote equality and development opportunities in all regions represented by its Members. In doing so, it must remain attentive to the needs of its constituents and their peoples.

In conclusion I should like to congratulate the Republic of South Africa for having succeeded in its democratic transition with the setting up of a non-racial government, and I should like to welcome its return to the United Nations in general and the ILO in particular. The ILO should be thanked and congratulated for its efforts and the action it has taken in ensuring the return of freedom and democracy to South Africa.

My country hopes that our Organization will continue to support this young democracy, with all the resources it is able to mobilize.

I would like to repeat my wishes for long life and success to the Organization which watches over social peace and the improvement of workers' living and working conditions and the welfare of their families.

Mr. SALIMIAN (Workers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate! I wish to take this opportunity to join the earlier speakers and extend our congratulations to the President on his election to chair the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. This session of the Conference is an auspicious occasion as it coincides with such an important event as the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. I also congratulate the Government of the brave people of South Africa on resumption of their membership. I would like to congratulate the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, and all his staff on the work which they have accomplished over the past year.

Proud to represent the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran, I wish to express my views, as well as the views of my colleagues and workers' organizations of my country, regarding the Director-General's Report to the 81st Session. I hope that this session of the Conference will lead to the adoption of measures which will enable the ILO to fulfil its mandate and secure the progress of social justice in the world of today and tomorrow.

The theme of the Director-General's Report, Defending values, promoting change, covers a vast subject and it would not be possible to touch upon each area within this limited period of time. So I would restrict myself to only a few areas, which are of particular importance to us.

Islam has placed utmost importance on the subject of social justice. As indicated in the Holy Quran "Surely God bids to justice and good-doing and good-giving to kinsmen".

Elsewhere the Holy Quran emphasizes social justice again, saying "Oh believers, be you securers of justice, witnesses for God. Let not detestation for a people move you not to be equitable; be equitable – that is nearer to godfearing. And fear God; surely God is aware of the things you do".

Irrespective of the good and positive intentions of the founders of the ILO, tripartism, right from the beginning, because of the dominant role of government at the international and national levels, and due to the coordination of employers and governments at most of the levels, has resulted in new tyrannies and the oppression of workers.

The collapse of the socialist system has further strengthened this thought that the employers and governments would try their best to reduce the standards which are socially oriented. They have even officially demanded the non-implementation of some of these Conventions and standards. In this regard, we would refer to the final resolution issued by the last Asian Ministerial Meeting.

Therefore, to strengthen social justice, the role of workers' organizations and their representatives must be extensively supported. In this respect, I propose that the government and workers have equal rights in tripartism. We are talking about social justice when one-third of the world's population – nearly 2 billion people – is below the age of 15 and facing an uncertain future, because of structural unemployment and widespread poverty.

In the developing countries, where 95 per cent of the world's population growth comes from, an improbable 38 million jobs will need to be created each year just to keep pace with the growing number of people reaching working age.

An estimated 1 billion people of the world's current population of 5-7 billion are living in poverty. Asia accounts for more than 660 million people, considered to be living below the bare subsistence level. The wealthy minority of about 25 per cent of the world population consumes three-fourths of the resources of the planet.

The Asian Development Bank has warned against swift and dirty growth in member States. The industrial revolution in Asia and the Pacific region has been both swift and dirty. Asia, with half of the world's population, is still the home of two-thirds of its poor. The ADB estimates that more than 700 million Asians are trapped in poverty.

The workers' organizations and trade unions have been misrepresented as opposing structural adjustment programmes. The fact is that we are not opposed to it, but are strongly critical of the way these programmes are carried out. We are of the opinion that these programmes should be formulated in full consultation with the social partners and with full consideration to the social repercussions.

The ILO has an accepted responsibility in respect to the social impacts of it, which was recognized by the November 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment. It is really quite unfortunate that the ILO has not been able to influence the process of adjustment in these regards or the approaches of the IMF and World Bank. The Director-General has admitted this fact – and I quote – "The ILO has, of course, repeatedly expressed its preoccupation with these problems, especially with respect to structural adjustment programmes, but has its voice really been heard?"

The IMF and World Bank are both well known as not being very socially oriented. Up till now the ILO has not succeeded in-depth fruitful negotiations with these financial institutions. The ILO should use more of its weight, authority and mandate and try to solve these various problems.

The structural adjustment programmes monitored by the said financial institutions have not achieved the desired result as per their own narrowly defined criteria. According to IMF statistics, the total developing countries' debt came to $1,472.2 billion in 1992, up from $846.6 billion a decade earlier.

The resolution adopted by the last session of the International Labour Conference concerning social protection, and the alleviation of unemployment and poverty, and the social dimension of structural adjustment and transition to a market economy, called on the ILO to develop, intensify and institutionalize close cooperation with the IMF. Therefore, the ILO must give urgent attention to this need to institutionalize its relations with other agencies and hence to systematize its place in the formulation of application of structural adjustment programmes. The results should be a formal memorandum of cooperation setting out the role of each agency and the mechanism through which they are to be realized.

In Farsi there is a saying that right is not given – it has to be sought. The second High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment in 1994 and the 1995 World Summit for Social Development provides an opportunity to the ILO to make an utmost effort to advance its agenda in these areas, and should not miss this golden opportunity. Besides that, the ILO, as per its past practices can offer clarification of the issue, and publish frank analysis on this social issue of structural adjustment and its related repercussions.

The Director-General in his Report asks whether the ILO, which was set up to contribute to world peace by promoting social peace still fulfil its mission. I think that the ILO has failed in its mission with special reference to the people and workers of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The arrogant of the world have always followed a double-standard policy. On the one hand, after aggression in another region, the United Nations immediately condemns it and issues a mandate to wage a war and asks other countries for money and forces. But on the other hand, the global arrogant are collaborating with the Serbs in victimizing the Muslims of Bosnia and Herzegovina. They have now been forced to admit that the Bosnians, on the charges of being Muslims, should be deprived of aid and donations. The fact is that the ignominious despotic system ruling over the world cannot tolerate the existence of a Muslim State in the heart of Europe. We propose that next year the ILO should have a special sitting on the situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the crimes committed against the Bosnians. This would be in accordance with the normal practice of the ILO as it has a special sitting on the situation in the occupied Arab territory – Palestine.

We agree with the idea put forward by the Director-General for the preparation of a major annual report, containing an authoritative analysis on the situation of employment and incomes in the world and the impact of economic and financial policies in them.

Although the ILO has always been criticized for its delay and slow response to the request for policy advice and assistance, we hope that it will fulfil the promises made to our workers' organization, especially the holding of a seminar on structural adjustment in Teheran in the near future.

Peace be upon us and the true followers of Allah.

Original Italian: Mr. BECCARI (Workers' adviser, San Marino) – I would like first of all to congratulate the President on his election. I am sure that he will be most successful in guiding the deliberations of this Conference.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO, aside from the solemnity of the occasion, has a special importance. It is taking place at a time of historic importance for the whole world, at a time when, for good or ill, a number of events are occurring that are changing the course of our lives.

The Report presented by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, and in particular the first part, has hit the nail on the head. We fully endorse it. It reflects once again the ability and experience of the Director-General as seen over the past years.

I would like to mention some pertinent ideas which, in my opinion, are in line with the spirit of Mr. Hansenne's Report. The first point relates to solidarity, particularly in the world of work, towards those countries which still suffer from social differentiation of a form that leads either directly or indirectly to the involvement of more industrialized countries. For instance, we are seeing an increase in emigration, particularly towards Europe, with the consequences of which we are all aware.

Solidarity, commitment and cooperation with countries which need our help are fundamental in order to attenuate the negative effects of a situation which, if it is allowed to continue unabated without providing any alternatives to emigration, will lead to an aggravation of social conflict.

Indeed, the economic situation in Europe is far from stable: unemployment is growing and the relevant figures are disturbing. There is, therefore, a need for solidarity and commitment to be undertaken by governments, but trade union organizations must also play their part – everyone should participate, and we will too.

Even in a small republic such as San Marino, and in a small trade union organization such as the one which I have the honour of representing, a great deal can be done. We have set up a solidarity fund which was recently approved and which will provide assistance to trade union organizations in countries which are in difficulty. We shall carry out small projects aimed at achieving results in the shortest possible time. Helping the trade union organizations of developing countries is essential for social and economic growth.

We must try to achieve an increase in the number of trade union organizations, the expansion of tripartite cooperation, the emergence of a new mentality which gives preference to dialogue over conflict and which creates a common front whenever this is possible and whenever it does not contradict the interests of those represented in each party, in order to achieve the objectives of economic stability, widespread well-being for the people, for the workers and for our countries.

To achieve this end we must endeavour to promote interest in agreements on social relations between all the parties to ensure that the new spirit and mentality prevail over the old antagonism-based logic whereby conflict is the only way of solving contractual problems.

In our country we have tried this approach, we have confronted difficulties within the trade union movement itself, we have overcome hesitation from various quarters, we have overcome, in particular, with our employer counterparts, a mutual feeling of distrust that goes back a long time. We have succeeded in a very important bargaining phase; it was difficult, but through cooperation and with the positive results we achieved, we were gradually able to overcome this distrust.

Not everything has been solved, not everything has become easy and we must not delude ourselves. The objectives of reaching agreement on social relations, of understanding the needs of the parties and of clearing the way of unnecessary hurdles, must be constantly pursued, without lowering one's guard, without losing one's own identity, and without forgetting one's role. I would like, and I say this without any presumptuousness, our experience to become an experience common to all, and for the ideal conditions to flourish to build a new relationship between the parties all over the world.

This will not be easy, because everywhere in the world, even in Europe, and unfortunately in some other industrialized countries too, fundamental rights such as the full development of trade union activities are still under discussion; opposition and legal traps abound to impede the workers being represented in a democratic and civil manner.

This is not a generalized phenomenon, but when a country is experiencing economic difficulties, trade unions become public enemy number one, the obstacle to restrictions. This is affecting workers more and more frequently. Freedom of association, the freedom of workers to freely and democratically associate themselves with the trade union associations they consider to be most representative, must be firmly established: through the wealth of ideas, freedom of thought, the multiplicity of social and trade union organizations, workers and citizens can grow and can make their country grow.

Let us all remember that social and economic well-being always leads to social peace, cultural growth and the progressive elimination of social barriers.

Through tripartism, the ILO's fundamental concept, this great institution, as the Director-General says in his Report, must ensure that no party gets the upper hand, so that social justice prevails, and so that mutual understanding, the ability to negotiate, and the ability to identify and select common goals, picking out those of a conflictual nature and dealing with them separately, win the day.

It is clear that the ideas and principles of the parties are not open to negotiation, which is equally true for individuals, but even when opinions and the view of the world are diametrically opposed there are common areas, there is the possibility of reaching an understanding which must be made to prevail over conflict. We must try to also admit to ourselves that we often lose sight of the real objectives in our useless and disastrous collisions between different principles and values. It is a huge effort, but it is an effort we must all make. I wish you every success at this Conference.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Original French: Mr. DECOSTERD (Employers' delegate, Switzerland) – On attaining the venerable age of 75, one tends to look back with some complacency on one's past. The directive organs of the ILO have avoided this mistake and this year we shall be called upon to ponder over the future of the ILO. So much the better.

There are two reasons why I wish to fuel this debate by offering a few personal reflections. Firstly, I wish to persuade the active employers' world, which is not widely represented here, and which questions the usefulness of this Organization, to not throw out the baby with the bath water.

The second reason is that I am preparing to put an end to an activity pursued with interest and hope for nearly 20 years at various levels and in various sectors of the ILO. I therefore feel I know what I am talking about.

In fact, the moment has come to undertake necessary reforms if we wish to put the ILO in tune with the end of the century. In the face of persistent economic sterility, it seems to be now generally recognized that by wishing to legislate more and more and tie up enterprise in a web of regulations and directives, we destroy the substance that encourages the development of a nation, namely the creation of wealth. One way of attenuating the acute problem of endemic unemployment is to do everything we can to stimulate the creation of small enterprises.

There is no lack of ideas but, as always and everywhere, we see in the Report of the Director-General, the difficulty is that of making the right decisions and above all implementing them. Why is this?

Because, like any other major organization, the ILO has got stuck in the past; because we are not aware of the basic difference between a dying industrial society and the new society which supersedes it; because employers and workers continue to fight about obsolete systems instead of supporting the new world of labour which is more in conformity with new forms of organization and life in general.

Very cleverly and no doubt conscious of the brakes which operate in all spheres of the ILO, the Director-General has placed the ball in its constituents' court. Very rightly, because these are in the last resort, responsible for the shortcomings mentioned, and it is they too who must give the necessary impulse to any reform or structural adaptation.

The Report before us contains more than 20 specific proposals; the time-limit having been imposed with some parsimony I shall, to my great regret, confine myself to what I consider to be the most important ideas, if we wish to ensure the future of the ILO.

Taking my inspiration from the title of the Report which is before us, I would first of all like to insist on three essential values to be defended: democracy, the dignity of the worker, and tripartism.

Only democracy can ensure the freedom of the individual, for any despot can force his slaves to sing hymns to freedom. We have known such persons and tolerated several of them in the ILO. Their presence perverts the action of tripartism. Therefore, let us be more rigorous in our respect for this fragile institution which is democracy. Democracy must be born and develop from the base to the summit, from the citizen to the authorities. It grants rights, but it also involves duties. Civic sense is one of them which is in its way a process of collective permanent bargaining, which extends from the village to the federal government.

The dignity of the working man is not only, as believed by the ILO, the protection of the worker. First and foremost, it involves teaching him an occupation of which he will be proud, enabling him to do a satisfying job and to give him a certain amount of freedom as to the choice of his time and his way of work – a freedom which he can regain with the end of our industrial society.

Finally, tripartism is a value to which the social partners must be especially attentive. But let us not be hypocritical. It must be an authentic tripartism which will guarantee the freedom of action and of decision of the various members of each delegation and which puts them on an equal footing throughout their mission. Must I remind you here that in 1992, to quote only one example, no fewer than 34 governments did not fulfil their material obligations allowing their Employer delegates to come to Geneva.

Let us look at the changes to be undertaken. It is essential to do this in a logical order, beginning by reaching agreement on a common vision for the future of the ILO. We cannot think of envisaging any major change if we do not first define what its purpose is to be, what we want to become. This is called "vision", a "project" or a "mission".

Seneca said: "There is no good wind for him who does not know his port." The ILO has realized this since 1919. It readapted it in 1944 by the Declaration of Philadelphia. In a few words, we have to contribute to worldwide lasting peace by promoting and developing social justice.

Is this vision realistic, in view of the means available to the ILO? No. It is excessive and vague, if we are not to be content with hot air. It has become common to several other specialized organizations of the United Nations which did not exist in 1944, and to non-governmental organizations and institutions of the European Union.

Here, the Director-General's Report is disconcerting. Having excellently explained that the world is experiencing a radical change, that the economy is becoming worldwide and the social links are breaking up, he adds that the course set 75 years ago remains adequate. So we want to change while keeping on the same course. That is frankly impossible. We cannot construct a new house with the plans of the old one.

The time has come for the ILO to show some originality, so that it may speak loud and clear among the other international organizations.

As an instance, I propose a vision that may seem too simple in the eyes of those content with social myths: improve the lot of the worker and contribute to the creation of jobs. At least this vision has the virtue of being specific, ambitious but realistic, and above all specific.

Allow me to insist by reminding you that, without prior agreement on a vision which would underlie our common action with a view to the future, the efforts made to bring about significant change will be in vain.

On the other hand, once this vision is adopted, specific priorities and special strategies can be envisaged, and it will be the right moment to examine a number of interesting proposals made in the Report of which I would like briefly to remind you: to adapt the Organization and the secretariat to the accelerated evolution of the world; to rename the Organization the International Employment and Labour Organization – IELO; to do fewer things, but do them better; to have more research programmes; to achieve greater flexibility in programmes and budgets; to get the ILO to express ideas and opinions instead of reports which are neutral, prudent and purely descriptive; to modernize and rationalize the Organization's meetings so as to arrive at conclusions and action instead of getting bogged down in the ritual of meetingitis.

All this could be done and would improve the credibility of the ILO, because then we would be acting in the spirit of the new vision and thus ensuring coherence with the various changes.

On the other hand, the idea of collective bargaining at a worldwide level should be rejected. Interventionism has proved that it is ineffective at the level of nations. Would it have more success at world-wide level? The same applies to the suggestion to negotiate international agreements between employers and workers of various industries and to create multinational works councils.

To the objections already known in this field, I would like to add one which is less known – collective bargaining is justified and practicable at a level characterized by a certain economic homogeneity, that is to say, the factory, the undertaking, the region or the national sector of industry. It is problematical even at the national level; we have seen this. It becomes inappropriate and harmful to the market economy at the international level.

The moment has come to conclude. Let us work in the spirit of a new vision which will consist in improving the lot of the worker and contributing to the creation of jobs. Let us link wages to productivity rather than to the indexation of prices, thus avoiding the collapse of the European economy. Let us set up areas of freedom by greater flexibility in working practices, and let us think up new solutions to settle work disputes. Let us stimulate the workers' motivation by improving personnel management. These are but a few examples.

But let us not forget that the first priority of our Organization must be to grant men and women the right to employment, as Mr. Hansenne repeats in his Report. The worst possible thing for a human being is to feel useless.

Original Arabic: Mr. MATAR (Employers' delegation, United Arab Emirates) – May the peace and mercy and the blessings of God be upon you! I should first like to congratulate the President and his Officers on their election to conduct the proceedings of this important session of the International Labour Conference. I also have pleasure in conveying to your Conference the greetings and best wishes of the Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry in the United Arab Emirates and in expressing the appreciation of employers in our country for the pertinent issues raised by the International Labour Conference at its annual sessions, issues of relevance to international labour at a time of rapid world change and the emergence of new factors and standards that will have a major impact on the organization of labour relations on a realistic and modern basis that serves and reconciles the interests of the three social partners. These circumstances make it essential for the ILO to review its structure, policies and effectiveness in order to keep pace with developments in international economic relations, the process of transition to a market economy and the growth in the number of member States of GATT, which will have an immediate impact on the entire world economy and on trade between most countries of the world, including the countries of our region, affecting the employment situation, wage levels, labour mobility and the creation of employment opportunities by modern enterprises. It will also create a need for training programmes to enhance the productivity and improve the performance of the business community and of workers.

This session of the Conference is of exceptional importance inasmuch as it coincides with two major events: the first event is the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which set forth the basic principles underlying the goals of the International Labour Organization.

The Director-General incorporated the peaceful concepts underlying these two important anniversaries and the new departure required to come to grips with the future in his Report to the Conference entitled Defending values, promoting change.

The second event is the ending of the era of oppression in South Africa that lasted for 350 years and the election of Nelson Mandela as a symbol of the victory of civilization over apartheid, laying the foundations of a trend toward peaceful coexistence based on humanitarian principles instead of racism. I take this opportunity to convey the best wishes of the Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates to the tripartite delegation of South Africa, representing the Government, workers and employers. We trust that it will play an active and constructive role in the international community.

Our Federation also has pleasure in welcoming our friends from the Sultanate of Oman to the International Labour Conference and to membership of the ILO together with the other new member States of the Organization.

The Director-General's Report reviewed the values and goals of the ILO and examined the challenges facing it, putting forward a number of proposals and ideas for future activities. Three important questions call for special attention. The first concerns the Organization's mandate and its relations with other international organization and institutions. We consider that the ILO was set up to address labour questions and relevant social issues and should continue to pursue those tasks without either going beyond its own fields of competence or allowing another organization to encroach on them.

We consider that the relations between specialized international organizations should be one of cooperation and coordination and we are therefore against the ILO playing any role in the field of international trade. Moreover, we see no connection between international trade and international labour standards and no justification for introducing protective measures against the exports of developing countries provided that international labour standards are respected.

The second matter concerns international labour standards and the Organization's role in establishing such standards. The lapse of 75 years since the founding of the ILO with all the changes and development that have occurred during that period make it essential to review and appraise international labour standards, including the way in which they are adopted and ratified, the machinery for monitoring their implementation, the status of current standards and what needs to be done in the future in that area.

The third matter concerns technical cooperation. We consider that the Organization should strengthen such activities in the light of countries' need for its services in that area. The scope of technical cooperation projects should be widened, funds for that purpose should be increased and its distribution should be rationalized so that it is shared equally between employers, workers and labour authorities.

Part II of the Director-General's Report covers the ILO's achievements in 1993 and a number of important questions are included in the agenda of this Conference. We should like to mention in particular the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. The International Labour Conference should give this matter the attention it deserves, studying it carefully and looking into the possibility of adopting an international instrument regulating such agencies and specifying their aims and legal framework.

The United Arab Emirates have succeeded in establishing a clear basis for labour relations and the organization of employment. Our Labour Code is a comprehensive one consistent with the most modern internationally recognized standards. It provides for benefits after a period of employment, for example the right to a bonus after continuous employment for a period of one year or more. A worker may opt for this bonus system and social security or retirement benefit, whichever seems more advantageous. The Code also provides for treatment and compensation for industrial accidents and occupational illness and allows workers to invest their income within the country or abroad without any restrictions or conditions.

These advantages and the general conditions provided under the Labour Code have made the United Arab Emirates a strong magnet for workers from neighbouring and friendly countries. All these workers live in harmony, enjoying the protection of the State and the benefits provided by its constituents bodies.

The Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Industry of the United Arab Emirates, which represents a united front of the business community in my country, remains eager to continue its cooperation with the ILO in the interests of well-being, generosity and the improvement of labour relations in accordance with modern principles.

In conclusion, I should like to wish this Conference every success.

Mr. MOHAMED (Workers' delegate, Malaysia) – Allow me to offer my congratulations to the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference. The election of a Worker representative as President on the occasion of this 75th anniversary of the ILO is indeed a testimony to the important role played by the workers in the ILO's efforts to promote peace based on social justice.

Let me now turn to the Director-General's Report entitled Defending values, promoting change. The workers in Malaysia welcome the opportunity this Report gives to reflect on the past as well as to consider the future. In this regard, the workers in Malaysia believe that in charting the future direction it is important that the ILO reaffirms its pledge that lasting peace can only be achieved through social justice.

Malaysia has reached full employment and in most parts of the country the wages have risen. Inflation has been kept under control and the cost of living has been kept low in spite of growth rates of about 8 per cent in the last seven years through prudent fiscal policies. The prospects of continuity of employment opportunities is good and living standards are expected to rise further. Fair living standards for the workers can only be achieved through sound labour policies and genuine consultation among the social partners. While we credit the Government of Malaysia for the overall economic growth in the country, we, as a labour movement, still believe that much more needs to be done to enable organized labour to be an effective social partner in development processes. As we move into the twenty-first century, workers' expectations will increase and there is a need to ensure that labour policies will be further enhanced to ensure trade union growth and bring about a greater measure of social justice in the country.

The Congress of Union of Employees in the Public and Civil Services (CUEPACS) has been instrumental in enhancing the quality of life of public sector workers in the country. We have secured wage reviews and revisions regularly in the last three decades. With the liberalization of the economy and the innovations made in the public sector to improve quality and accountability, CUEPACS is of the view that public sector workers should be also brought within the ambit of collective bargaining, like workers in the private sector. In these regards, we would like to thank the ILO mission to Malaysia in March-April 1993 to provide technical advice in this area. We believe that the enhancement of collective bargaining rights will motivate and improve further the efficiency of the public sector in Malaysia.

ASEAN governments and employers have expressed strong opposition to the social clause contending that it will affect employment growth and development opportunities in our countries. This is something we will want to discuss with our social partners in Malaysia and study the implications carefully.

The main labour issue that has preoccupied workers, employers and governments attending this Conference, which marks the 75th anniversary, seems to be the social clause. Some ask, what has trade to do with labour rights? We heard and, in fact, entertained fears that self-interest groups in the West are trying to impose the social clause as a means to bring about global minimum wages and other forms of pressure under the pretext of human rights in the face of competition from developing countries to impede the current investment climate and fast economic development taking place in the developing countries.

What the labour movement must do is to ensure that the social clause is not used to reduce the competitive advantage developing countries have in lower wages or to create an international minimum wage. It is also the labour view that the social clause should not be used as an artificial equalization of labour standards between the rich and the developing countries. Developing countries must be given time to develop and overcome their structural adjustment problems, unemployment and poverty alleviation agenda. At the same time, there is a need to give workers in the developing countries a fair chance to better their living standards and labour rights over time. We feel strongly that gains made through investments in developing countries must be also equitably distributed amongst its population.

The labour movement in Malaysia also believe that international labour standards are important to ensure equitable benefits to workers and it requires those countries who have ratified the relevant ILO Conventions to ensure effective implementation. While every effort is being made by the ILO to have those Conventions ratified by others, the ILO should ensure that these standards are not violated. The Director-General, in his Report, has also stated that the ratification rate is low. There is therefore a need to study and update these standards further so that they reflect the realities of the situation in developing countries.

For humanitarian reasons it is important for the ILO to address the enormous problem of child labour. Technical assistance should be a central element in ILO activity, and in this regard I would strongly urge the ILO to devote sufficient resources for trade union education for both public and private-sector workers. My labour organization also supports that the ILO should provide tripartite input to the World Summit for Social Development to be held in March 1995 in Copenhagen. This Summit comes at a time when the many developing countries are deeply concerned with economic gloom, unemployment and debt.

This brings me to what I believe should be the ILO's top priority in the coming decades. According to the latest World Labour Report by the ILO, an average of 43 million jobseekers enter the labour market each year. In the OECD countries alone, about 36 million potential workers are unemployed. However, in the East Asian economies many countries are in full employment because they are pursuing policies that do not encourage rigid labour markets and inflexible wages. In these countries active labour market policies have led to high skill, high wage jobs. About 13 years ago, when our Prime Minister, Dr. Mahathir Mohamad, told our nation to look East, particularly at labour-market policies, few people were convinced. Today the World Bank has described this phenomena as the "East Asian miracle".

I am strongly convinced that the ILO, with its mandate to uplift the working conditions of workers through freely chosen and productive employment, can learn from the examples of these countries. I am also strongly convinced that the ILO will continue to promote social justice that will place more emphasis on the human face of development, and thus help to set up a new blueprint for the future.

With this, I conclude my address with the hope that the ILO will continue to strive to work towards labour's cause.

Original French: Mr. GLELE (Employers' delegate, Benin) – I would like to extend the very warmest congratulations of the employers of Benin to the President. We are happy to see him presiding over this year's historic session of the Conference.

It is an historic session because we are celebrating two anniversaries, the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. His fervent advocacy of the cause of workers together with his great experience in trade union matters bode well for the success of this session. We also congratulate the Vice-Presidents, whose qualities will stand them in good stead to assist the President with efficiency.

We also present our sincerest congratulations to the Director-General of the International Labour Office on the high standards of the document he has submitted to us for discussion. We would like to thank him for this useful tool.

This 81st Session of our Conference coincides, as I already said, with two major events: the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. These two events have left their mark this year on the Director-General's Report. Indeed, the Report reviews and analyses the past. It also studies the present, and at the same time it paves the way for the future of our Organization by providing certain ideas.

Since any such review calls for critical examination, permit me, Mr. Director-General, to express a few thoughts on your Report before making some proposals. The innovations which the Report mentions as regards the tripartite system will make the system more cumbersome. It is already a somewhat costly and problematic system for African governments. They are not always ready and willing to pay for all the partners, and in particular for the employers. The other members of the population to which the tripartite system is to be opened, i.e. civil society, are already involved in non-governmental bodies which, with the governments, are members of the tripartite structure. The employers are those who produce the wealth in all activities of national life, including rural life. The workers represent all the other sectors of society, including those who are self-employed. That being so, in our humble opinion there is no need to extend this structure in any way. To do so would only make the system more unwieldy and costly. Into which category would these social actors from civil society fall if they do not fit into tripartism as it has stood since the ILO was formed?

Who are these actors?

Would tripartism still be tripartism if it included a fourth component which necessarily reinforced one of the links in the chain? In our humble opinion, tripartism as we know it – the tripartism that works – would inevitably disappear if we changed its current composition. The main thing for the International Labour Office is to continue unswervingly to fight for it to be respected and put into practice by all the member States of the ILO, because there is no other machinery or structure where the interests and concerns of the various parts of the nation are better dealt with and taken into account. Free employers' and workers' organizations should thus be promoted, developed and strengthened. They require constant logistic support and training in order for them to play their roles effectively.

As regards the standard-setting policy of the Organization, the Office should at first prepare a study to take stock of the standards approved so far. The study should identify the reasons for problems or unwillingness in the ratification of certain standards by the States. Standards that have not been ratified lack legal backing and are in no way binding on States which decide to turn a blind eye to them. The application of these standards should be the first and foremost mission of the ILO. Therefore, we should see what is blocking their ratification and envisage a new approach for the future as regards the standard-setting policy of the ILO.

I should now like to address what is currently the major concern of all the States of the globe, the question of employment.

Here too, changing the initials of the Organization of the ILO to IOEL, thus including the word "employment" in the name as suggested on page 31 of the Report, would, in our opinion, provide no new and effective solution to this crucial problem. We believe in Benin that the solution to employment problems resides in improving the economies of our countries.

How can we get the economy back on track? How can we improve the conditions for this recovery? That should be the focus of our attention. There can be no employment without economic development.

How can we create jobs when there is no solution to the debt crisis? This crisis is even worsening in French-speaking countries owing to the recent devaluation of the CFA franc?

How can we create jobs without industrializing our economies and without processing our own raw materials?

Have we any say in fixing the prices of our raw materials?

How can we have lasting development of the economies based on the establishment of small and medium-sized enterprises when there are no financial development institutions in our countries?

How can we speak of job creation when all the measures that have been taken favour staff cutbacks?

These are some of the questions which are of increasing concern to us, because the world's unemployment is a veritable time bomb just waiting to go off unless it is somehow defused before it is too late.

This is why the employers' recommend to the ILO to help us draw up a genuine strategy for productive employment and a real rural employment policy covering all parts of rural life. This is the only way in which people living in rural areas will be encouraged to stay on their land. The ILO must continue to promote and support the productive activities of the informal sector, integrating it progressively in the world economy.

We welcome the World Summit for Social Development to be held in Copenhagen. It will take into consideration all aspects of the problem, including its repercussions for social factors.

We are counting on the Director-General of the International Labour Office to express our concern to his opposite numbers from the other specialized agencies of the United Nations, and especially the IMF and the World Bank.

These were the comments and ideas that the Director-General's Report prompted in the National Employers' Organization of Benin. It gave us the opportunity to discuss the future of the ILO as the Organization celebrates its 75th birthday and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We would like again to thank the Director-General for having given us this opportunity to make our modest contribution to the work of the Conference.

Original Spanish: Mr. HUEMBES (Workers' delegate, Nicaragua) – On behalf of the workers of the Workers' Federation of Nicaragua, I wish to offer our brotherly greetings and congratulations to the President on his election. We are sure that his experience is a guarantee for the success of this Conference.

This is a proper moment to congratulate the ILO on having completed 75 years of historical existence in the defence of workers' welfare and at the same time, we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

I have read with great interest the Report of the Director-General, and I can only express my gratitude for its contents, particularly since we all know that the enemies of tripartism and consultation do not support institutions which, like the ILO, are trying to maintain the balance and peace essential for social justice.

Looking at the political history of Nicaragua dating back to the country's independence in 1821, it should be pointed out that in 1990 a Government was for the first time elected by popular vote. Since ours is a Government of transition, the workers are making every effort to ensure that this profoundly imperfect and unjust democracy is consolidated and improved for the greater good of the nation's workers and of humanity as a whole.

In reality, it would be highly irresponsible if, because of today's errors we would return to our past of dictatorship and mistakes which plunged our population into poverty and pain.

The neo-liberal policies which are being applied in the world in light of structural adjustments, are harming the majority of mankind, and their effects are being felt in particular by the poorest sections of the population. Pragmatic capitalism, spurred on by the fall of the Berlin Wall and the failure of other models of society may be leading mankind to far more dangerous phenomena and political events than anything we have seen already.

In reality, it is a source of grave concern that certain sectors, attracted by the prospect of speculation and illicit riches are now attempting to reject such important organizations as the ILO, insisting on the need to make standards more flexible and to dismantle the supervisory machinery. In doing so, they employ the erroneous argument that it is now important to have an internationalized economy, greater flexibility, a market economy, overlooking that over and beyond the laws of the market, abuse and speculation, there are the rights of the people.

Allow me to quote two simple examples of what has happened in Nicaragua to illustrate my point.

The "Candelaria" banana plantation, in the Department of Chinandega, has, over the past 12 months illegally dismissed more than 600 workers. Even though this action was illegal, the Ministry of Labour and the first and second instance tribunals have been unable to obtain their reinstatement. Also, for a year, orders have been made for payment of unpaid wages. In spite of this, the employer has remained intransigent and has disregarded the ruling of the Minister and the courts. However, what is even more serious and reprehensible is that the employer has, on three occasions, made use of paramilitary forces, and given orders to open fire on the workers. The last time this happened was on 10 June. The owner of this estate is none other than the President of the Supreme Council for Private Enterprise (COSEP), whom I regret to say was once was a deputy Employers' delegate in the Governing Body of International Labour Organization.

Also in the poultry industry, at the "La Estrella" farm in the Department of Managua, Mr. José Castillo has once again refused collective bargaining and is still threatening his workers with dismissal when any attempt at collective bargaining is made. These threats of dismissal have even been put before the highest labour authorities. Nevertheless, this gentleman has been decorated at the Central American level for his production efficiency by the Central American Association of Poultry Producers. This distinction has been obtained at the cost of the exploitation, poverty and tears of the workers of the "La Estrella" farm.

The ILO Committee on Freedom of Association is aware of these cases and I am grateful for the part which it has played in this connection. I take this opportunity to congratulate the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on its magnificent contribution to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, especially on its excellent document entitled Freedom of association and collective bargaining. This text offers us a mine of useful information in our ongoing daily struggle for justice.

Apart from the above-mentioned brakes systematically applied to trade union freedoms, the employers possess yet another instrument for defeating Nicaraguan trade unionism. I refer to the employers' associations which hamper or eliminate any form of trade union organization.

This, of course, is an assault on freedom of association and a torpedo launched against democracy. It is an attempt to sidestep trade union action, the authentic defence of the workers.

The workers of Nicaragua support the objectives set forth by the Director-General of the ILO in trying to give fresh weight to the values which led to the setting up of the ILO, particularly those in respect of the systematic struggle for equity and social justice.

If present-day society lacks anything, it is surely justice and solidarity and hence we greet with great hope the message delivered to this assembly by Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the United Nations, in referring to the celebration of the World Summit for Social Development.

We look forward to that Summit and have high hopes for it, and we are sure that on that occasion the ILO will represent and defend the objectives and interests of the workers of the world.

I repeat the best wishes of Nicaraguan workers for the 75th anniversary of the ILO and we undertake to make every contribution we can to make the ILO more efficient, functional and effective and ready to offer its help in meeting the needs of the poorest classes, and able to take part in the excellent tripartism which, despite the problems which confront us daily, has been a most important advantage for workers, governments and employers.

Mr. MAKEKA (Employers' delegate, Lesotho) – I feel honoured and indeed privileged to address this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, a session that marks the 75th anniversary of the founding of the Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Permit me, though, at the very outset to express my delegation's congratulations to the President, on his historic and well-deserved unanimous election, as a Workers' delegate of his great country, to chair this session of the Conference. May I also extend the same sentiments to the Vice-Presidents. We are confident that together they will guide the deliberations of this Conference to a fruitful conclusion.

Anniversaries are occasions for celebrations and making merry. They are also occasions to take stock, look back and plan for the future. We should therefore take this opportunity to reaffirm and rededicate ourselves to the lofty ideals and principles that have guided the letter and spirit of this Organization during the past 75 years. We are gratified that the Organization made it over these years because of the vision and flexibility of those who stewarded this Organization. They deserve our congratulations for a job well done.

We all agree that the successes of the past are no reason for complacency. It is time to look at and review the Organization with a critical eye, to make it relevant and responsive to the needs and concerns that it will be facing in the twenty-first century. The Director-General has already given us the benefit of his views and vision of what this Organization should be in the years that lie ahead. It is only fair that we should all state our views as this can only be of benefit to the future of this Organization. The Office and all constituents of the International Labour Organization are very familiar with the position of the Employers' group on this issue, and the leadership of the group has restated that position from this very rostrum. There is therefore no need for me to belabour the issues, particularly in the light of the constraint of time at our disposal.

The employers of Lesotho believe that whatever reform or restructuring that we may embark upon, it must strengthen the Organization and not destroy or even weaken it. We have to acknowledge that this Organization in its uniqueness provides the only forum where governments, workers and employers can meet, discuss and exchange views on economic and social issues that are very vital for any meaningful economic growth and development. We all agree that the ILO should adjust to the realities of the changing world if it is to remain relevant and responsive to the needs and concerns of its constituents. The world is changing very fast with market-oriented economies spreading like wildfire and, if the ILO is to stay on board, it must adopt a private-sector thinking, outlook and posture.

Unemployment and poverty continue to be the most serious problems facing most member countries of this Organization. Therefore, job-creation and poverty alleviation must be the primary concern of this Organization, because it is only through collaboration between the three social partners that jobs may be created, and it is only through job creation that poverty can be tackled head on. The Organization must take a lead in this necessary collaboration by, inter alia, accepting that employers are equal partners in this tripartite Organization and must be treated as such in all its operations and structures. The equal partnership between workers and employers as constituents of the Office must be established, nourished and strengthened. It is therefore inappropriate at this stage to talk about opening up the Organization to the so-called other interest groups. To do so would do harm to what is already a non-parity situation between the social partners referred to above. The strength of this Organization is in its tripartism. This tripartism must permeate all ILO operations and structures, right from the Office itself, where employers are disproportionately underrepresented, down to member States, where governments have yet to institutionalize consultations with the social partners in the design, planning and implementation of economic and social programmes.

Within each social group there are differences in that some are economically advanced, others are termed developing, while others like Lesotho are underdeveloped. Underdevelopment is characterized by, inter alia, massive unemployment and underemployment. To us unemployment is the number one problem and it is thus our quest to attract investors to our country to help create the much needed jobs while producing goods and services matching international standards and quality. It is a fact that investors are motivated by two factors only, namely the profit margin and the cost factor. It is also a fact that most investors tend to come from developed countries where major markets of their products abound. In our view, free cross-border movement of investments and of goods and services is what world trade is all about. It is the very essence of globalization of the world economy.

A few years back I had an opportunity to address this Conference about the serious concerns of employers of Lesotho about ILO standards. I stated then and I reiterate now that we all accept that there are basic standards, like freedom of association, which must be universal in character and application. However, standards on conditions and terms of employment must be left to each member State to determine, as this is the only way peculiar circumstances and levels of economic development and activity of a particular country may be taken into account. I made it clear then that international labour standards are being used to make our economies less competitive vis-à-vis those of the developed countries. We cautioned against the perennial adoption of ever-increasing standards which are too onerous for the capacities of some of our countries, both in quantity and quality, to comply with. It is becoming more and more difficult for many of our countries to ratify these Conventions. Indeed, even those that had ratified Conventions as a matter of habit are either denouncing them or simply putting them on the shelves to gather dust. It is thus unrealistic to make ILO technical cooperation conditional on observance and compliance with labour standards.

As if the above-stated problem is not enough, we are now told that compliance with the so-called "social clause" should be a condition for countries to engage in international trade and have access to world markets. We had heard about the social clause in the context of the European Union. However, at the recent conclusion of the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations, an attempt was made to globalize the clause as part and parcel of the new economic trade order. At the beginning of this Conference, we were interestingly surprised when the Director-General unilaterally plunged this Organization right into the centre of this ongoing debate. The developing countries rejected this proposed linkage in Marrakesh and there is no reason to believe that it will be acceptable here at the ILO.

It is interesting to find out whether workers in the developing countries will be the beneficiaries of these conditionalities. What is sure is that the workers in the country that is alleged not to be in compliance are the ones who will ultimately lose their very scarce and much needed jobs. I stated earlier in my remarks that an investor in country A will only move to country B if the cost factor and the profit margin warrant the move. The net effect of this so-called social clause is to make the move of investors uneconomic because the labour costs in country B will be too expensive to warrant a move. Last but not least, our workers have had association with the ILO for many years now, and we want to believe that they are perfectly capable of defending their rights and interests. Yet, the condescending and patronizing attitude continues unabated with the social clause being a new weapon supposedly used to protect the workers from us.

In conclusion, allow me to congratulate the new Members of our Organization and in particular the readmission of South Africa into the fold of the community of nations. It is particularly pleasing to us in Lesotho because, as South Africa is our only close neighbour, we too felt the wrath of apartheid. The road to freedom was not easy and the leaders of South Africa deserve our praise and congratulations for their courage, wisdom and foresight in resolving their differences through negotiations and democratic elections. The road ahead may prove to be very difficult but good foundations have been laid down for a peaceful and prosperous South Africa. There is no doubt that this will be beneficial to Lesotho and other countries in the region. We particularly welcome our employer brothers from South Africa with their new organization, Business South Africa, and look forward to closer and more fruitful cooperation with them.

Mr. THORPE (representative of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy and General Workers' Unions) – The Report of the Director-General, which is the starting-point of our debate, speaks vividly – and in my view accurately – of the globalization of economic decision-making and of the resulting weakening of the ability of the Nation-State to control its own economic and social destiny.

It is clear, for example, that investment by multinational companies has now become a greater economic force than world trade between nations. According to the United Nations World Investment Report for 1993, sales generated by the subsidiaries of multinationally operating companies outside their countries of origin totalled $5.5 trillion, while the total value of world exports amounted to only $4 trillion.

Between 1983 and 1990 foreign investment grew three times faster than world trade and four times faster than world output.

But these statistics still vastly understate the real power of the leading corporations. It is these same corporations that dominate the development of new technology and the flow of investment capital. Through thousands of joint ventures, cross-licensing deals and market-sharing arrangements, a dense corporate network has been constructed that derides any discussion of free trade or competition.

Behind the headlines that speak of inter-regional trade rivalries and free market competition, there is more actual cooperation, more planning of the global economy and more interlinking between interests than ever before in the history of mankind. But this cooperation does not take place in the public arena. It is not subject to democratic oversight. It takes place in the private and secretive boardrooms of the multinational companies.

The truth is that the national political process has lost control over the real world of economics.

The galloping advance of privatization across all types of political, economic and social systems is only the most blatant evidence of the resulting abdication of policy-making from the democratic public arena to the private corporate boardroom. The leading companies have escaped from the previous social consensus. National or regional production bases are seen as available resources among many others – not as a commitment; above all, they no longer have a commitment to create jobs and a balanced national economy.

If we accept that real economic change is brought about not by governments nor by obscure market forces but by very tangible and globally operating companies, then we stand challenged to ensure that the necessary structures are empowered to meet these prevailing economic entities on their own ground. In short, global corporate institutions need to be balanced by competent global civic institutions representing the interests of people – as workers, as citizens and as decision-makers – in shaping their own futures.

After 75 years of existence, the ILO would seem to be more necessary to the next phase of human development than ever before – if it can rise to the challenge. Indeed, if the ILO did not exist, we would have to invent it.

Yet, while the international organs of trade and investment – the GATT, the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank – are creating widespread misery in their efforts to deregulate and to readjust national economies to ensure a so-called "level playing field" for capital across the globe, we see no countervailing strong advocacy of similar common rights for world labour from the international institutions. Instead we see a tendency to diminish the importance and application of international labour Conventions that have been won through hard years of struggle and debate. And at this anniversary Conference that should reinforce the defence of labour rights, we have seen the attack upon existing rights of working people that is a stark reflection on the daily experience of our trade union members in every land.

International organizations of workers, such as the industrial federation that I represent, do not intend to allow the interests of their members and the structures of their trade unions to be undermined by the creeping process of corporatization that has affected other international agencies. In order for labour to remain within the social consensus it will be necessary to ensure that progress on labour rights keeps pace with the rising power of capital. That was the unequivocal task of the ILO at its foundation and it is even more profoundly its obligation at the present time.

To lessen its pursuit of this goal – or even to divert its energies from the firm and universal application of labour rights to the simple servicing of employment information needs – would turn the ILO's objective of social justice into a hollow sham. The results of such a reversal would be the collapse of tripartism and a return to the situation of social warfare that the ILO was created to prevent.

Of course, there are many who see a return to worldwide economic and social anarchy as an opportunity for capital – much as it was perceived during the Industrial Revolution that transformed the old economies during the last century. The world trade union movement itself is no stranger to social warfare – indeed, its proud history is a history of struggle against injustice during those times. But a return to economic and social Darwinism – this time on a global scale and under the guise of market freedom – will benefit no one. The present-day global economy is so interdependent that such a scenario would plunge the world into a descending spiral of conflict that would endanger the survival of humanity itself.

To avoid this prospect there needs to be a revival of the social consensus, not a weakening of resolve. The central role of the ILO in the defence of civic values has to be strengthened, not undermined in the service of corporate interests. New and stronger measures have to be developed to confront governments which do not subscribe to common standards of human decency in the treatment of their citizens at work – not so-called "flexibilities" fabricated to excuse child labour and the incarceration and murder of trade unionists.

I say again, if the ILO did not exist, we would need to invent it. But it does exist and we need to defend it, to strengthen it and to extend its remit to deal with the new realities of the global repression now bearing down upon working people. To that end, the world's industrial workers commit themselves.

Original Spanish: Mr. MELGAREJO GARCÍA (Workers' delegate, Uruguay) – We greet this double anniversary this year, the creation of the ILO 75 years ago and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, which constituted a stepping stone in modern social concepts. The ILO was the response to more than a century of poverty and the exploitation of the workers starting in the Industrial Revolution.

Now, as before, capital has joined forces with technology, being used to make vassals of the workers, diminishing their standards of living and work and promoting unemployment. Today this instrument, namely neo-liberalism, is responsible for a long-lasting recession with a marked fall in workers' quality of life.

I will now refer to the Director-General's Report. This is a document which examines in depth the present state of the ILO and its prospects for the future. As with all such analyses, some aspects in it can be supported and others not.

One of the central points made in this document is economic globalization. We are told that changes are so radical that we may now talk about the decline and demise of the nation States. It is true that States are no longer masters of their own fate, and are subject to international financial bodies, such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and so on. We are told that they cannot keep a check on investments and that multinational enterprises have grown to such an extent that the 37,000 such non-financial enterprises operating at the beginning of 1990, as against the 7,000 registered 20 years ago, now control something like one-third of the production of the private sector throughout the world.

As the Director-General says, it is difficult to imagine that these forces will desist from trying to increase their share in the market. He adds that States can no longer monitor investments since, as it suits them, the transnational relocate their work, moving from one country to another whenever they are most likely to make a profit.

This description and this diagnosis which we agree with, has competition as the springboard of success – we have to sell more and more to get the necessary hard currency to meet national needs and to this end we have to reduce costs, amongst them, neo-liberalism includes labour costs, although this means impoverishment for the workers therein as a whole.

But what is being attempted? To bring wages into line with those of the workers in countries which so far have no labour protection or social security? Is it ethical to destroy all the workers have obtained over the centuries? We think that this is the intention of the employers and of many politicians who advocate total deregulation of the labour market, stating that labour flexibility is essential to achieve an upturn in the economy. We see this doctrine as leading inexorably towards a levelling down of conditions of work.

We are convinced that workers must radically confront this policy in its struggle for social justice, allowing a degree of labour flexibility as we adopt to new technology, but ensuring that such technology is always responsibly applied with an eye to social welfare.

Hence we cannot accept the proposal made by the Director-General as to the expediency of accepting a "soft law" which would include standards less legally binding than those of international Conventions. We are convinced of the need to insist on reinforcement of the ILO's standard-setting activities and we reject the attitude of the International Organization of the Employers as regards the need to limit standard-setting activities. This work was behind the creation of the ILO and the story of its life is far from over.

With reference to standards, we cannot but express our misgivings about the lack of implementation – total or partial – on the part of member States. Let us give the example of our own country, where there has yet to be enacted a standard which would protect trade union activists against arbitrary action by the employers; it has thus ignored the obligation of member States to protect their workers by ratifying the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

One specific case amongst the many which I could mention concerns INDUNOR, a branch of General Electric, which dismissed part of its staff after 82 days of strike, including all the trade union leaders. As my country has failed to adopt the above-mentioned Convention, it is impossible – from a legal standpoint – to call for the reinstatement of those dismissed.

Continuing with this analysis, we agree that technical cooperation should also be reinforced; but this should be subject to two conditions. First, it must comply with the new guidelines issued by the ILO; and second, all programmes must have, as one of their objectives, the promotion and implementation of international conventions which have been adopted.

We agree with the proposal in the Report about the need to institute a mechanism to control international trade. It is essential that its terms of reference should be limited to implementing the fundamental rights of the exporting countries; but beyond that we have to ensure that such a mechanism does not provide inacceptable protection for the trade of the industrialized countries. But we have to accept it in countries in which human rights are respected.

We would also like to refer to structural adjustment policies. As we have said on numerous occasions, we cannot agree that the rescheduling of the external debt should be attained at the cost of the misery and lack of protection of the underdeveloped countries. Mr. Delors, President of the Commission of the European Communities and Mr. Camdessus, Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund, have given their support to those defending workers' rights, by stressing the need for social questions to be included in the formulation of structural adjustment policies. This role unquestionably is one for the ILO to undertake; and until this objective is achieved, it must extend its tripartite efforts.

We also have certain reservations as to the Director-General's concern with regard to the organic participation of private companies within the ILO. We think that the present tripartite structure must be preserved at all costs and therefore we cannot accept such a suggestion.

I cannot end without speaking out in protest against the violence to which certain countries are submitted; and I would quote for example Colombia and our fellow workers there. Incredibly, on the threshold of the twenty-first century, torture, injustice, prison and the murder of trade unionists are commonplace.

At the same time we abhor the misery and suffering, endured by countries subjected to an economic blockade. There are often justifiable only on political grounds, which in many cases have very little or nothing to do with the case in point.

Twenty-first sitting

President: Mr. Mendoza

Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General: Discussion (cont.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – We shall now continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. GOMEZ ESGUERRA (representative of the Latin American Central of Workers) – First of all, we should like to join the preceding speakers in congratulating the President on his election.

We are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the only organization of the United Nations system which is tripartite. It is the only one in which we the workers are able to find a platform to discuss and debate alternative solutions to international, regional and national problems which affect the development of our people within an invaluable and essential framework of peace, democracy and freedom based on social justice.

We fully agree with the Director-General when he states in his Report that: "the ILO must be careful not to be caught up in any ideology or fashion that leads to a juridical vacuum and, inevitably, to a return to the law of the junglea; that would only take us back to the situation that prevailed in the early years of the Industrial Revolution, and to the unfortunate social consequences which our Organization was created to address".

We believe that this is the crucial problem we must face and solve, and that the best way of celebrating the 75th anniversary would be to look beyond our differences and realize the need to preserve and deepen a shared legal framework which is coherent and effective – one which avoids the excesses of a mercantile cannibalism which undermines the essence and existence of millions of human beings at the mercy of humiliating living and working conditions.

It pains us to witness that quite clearly profit takes precedence over life, and productivity and competitiveness over social justice. Possessing more takes precedence over being more, in an economic, political and social climate where people are measured by their profitability and their capacity to consume, rather than by their very nature and their human dignity.

We also share the Director-General's views in his analysis when he says that: "... given the new and more aggressive forms of international competition, neither the developing nor the developed countries are inclined to reinforce – or even to maintain – a level of social protection that might discourage foreign investment or provoke the relocation of production". With all due respect we must admonish not the countries, but the governments for their dangerous, incoherent and genocidal attitude because this attitude, and we affirm it with full conviction, does not tally with the feelings, needs and aspirations of our peoples.

In increasingly numerous situations, we are getting closer and closer to the "law of the jungle". In fact, many times we live in the jungle already and we are surrounded by torture. Because there is no greater torture and violence than hunger, misery, injustice and social exclusion which lead to the untold suffering of people and families – a true personal and collective torture which degrades human beings. These scourges also undermine the dignity of people, corrupt our majorities and lead to despair; they lead to generalized forms of violence and a growing violation of human rights and human freedoms which are enshrined in innumerable international agreements – especially the Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO.

More than 30 per cent of the Latin American population is lacking in drinking-water – and more than one-third does not have access to health services. In one year (1992-1993) the minimum urban wage index in real terms fell from 67.6 to 66.8; in other words, it fell below the subsistence level and was lower than the minimum wage index for 1980.

At the same time the consumer price index increased from 7.9 to 10.2; in other words by almost 50 per cent.

More than 50 per cent of the Latin American population consume calorie levels far lower than the normal minimum level. Fifteen per cent of all the children between one and 60 months of age are suffering from serious malnutrition and, at the same time, there is a 2 per cent reduction in the production of food every year in this particular region.

Between 1992 and 1993 there was an almost 10 per cent cut in national budgets as far as education was concerned, and millions of children cannot complete their primary education. And health expenditure in a single year (1992-1993) – and this was the most alarming trend – was reduced from 22.5 per cent to 9.6 per cent; in other words it was cut to less than half.

In the Latin American region, where many of our countries have embarked upon the process of democracy and development, we have one doctor for 1,777 inhabitants and two hospital beds for each 1,000 inhabitants. We have an alarming infant mortality and illiteracy rate. At the same time, more money is given over to security, defence and the purchase of arms and more funds are given over to servicing the foreign debt than to housing, education, health and nutrition.

If there was any moment in the history of the ILO when it was necessary to preserve and deepen the legal framework of standards – the only means our workers have to defend their rights against the greed of governments and enterprises – it is the present moment.

It is quite clear that international labour standards can only be effective to the extent that the member States agree by ratifying the instruments. But the fact remains that these same States are violating these standards or tacitly tolerating the violation of these rights in the private sector.

We are living in a terrible climate of social explosion – the product of poverty and social marginalization affecting the majority of our people: this jeopardizes the process of democracy and the very future of the Latin American region. From Chiapas to Santiago del Estero, via Caracas, Bogota and Lima, we can see a reality which does not tally with the political speeches our governments make on the stability and social and political development of our countries.

Many are speaking about the preparation of the World Summit for Social Development, but they reject any form of social consultation and dialogue on the crucial matter for our future – the "social component".

Dialogue and consultation are a prerequisite for peaceful and democratic co-existence in our nations. Consequently, in preparation for this historic meeting, CLAT proposes that Latin America, as a region, should make specific plans for this World Summit. Therefore, we have called for a Latin American Social Summit in December this year, to show our concern for the maze of problems that specifically affect us.

Finally, we cannot turn away from the challenge the Director-General has put before us in his Report, Defending values, promoting change.

From our point of view, as Latin American workers, we believe we have to promote change to preserve values; and we have to reject those who speak of the inevitable adjustment to "reality" as if there were only one interpretation of this reality, thus refusing to recognize the need for change and opening the door to those with an unscrupulous appetite for profit and power.

For they want to confuse development with growth and, above all, to justify the underdevelopment of the masses by the prosperity of the few. They tell us about the need to create a climate of freedom, flexibility, promotion, and individual initiative – but reality shows us that freedom is a privilege of the few, flexibility is simply directed at the elimination of fundamental human rights and individual initiative is limited to the private benefit of financial capital to the detriment of human capital.

Today, more than ever before, we need a change; a change to the terrible structural adjustment policies which have been imposed on us; a change which brings out the creativity and responsibility of governments and people; a change which provides for dialogue and consensus; a change which taps the potential of our people; and a change which enables us to regain our dignity and gives hope to all men and women so that they can look forward into the future together.

Original Russian: Mr. NEYKOV (Workers' delegate, Bulgaria) – I should first like to congratulate the President on his election.

For four years now we have been endeavouring in Bulgaria to reform the post-Communist system and to move to a market economy.

We should like to voice our unambiguous approval of the conclusion reached by the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, in his Report to the effect that the market economy has received massive support because it has brought hope for a better life, while making it possible to end interference by the State in the economy and in industrial relations.

Despite painful measures, the Bulgarian people have kept their patience and preserved social peace in the hope that reform will eventually fulfil its promises. However, our people have had to pay an exceptionally high social price. We have the highest rates of impoverishment in Central and Eastern Europe: in the period 1991-93 real incomes dropped by 60 per cent. We have the highest rate of unemployment in Eastern Europe: 21 per cent and over 60 per cent in regions populated by mixed ethnic communities. We have lost markets and means of livelihood due to international embargoes, crises, war, etc. As a result of the embargo against Yugoslavia alone, Bulgaria lost US$2,500 million. Bulgarian agriculture cannot feed the country any more. Hospitals, schools, universities, research and cultural establishments are on the brink of collapse. Dozens of municipalities, especially those inhabited by gypsy and Turkish populations, receive no social benefits.

Politicians and international financial institutions assure us that other nations which have been through all this have attained material prosperity and built up a competitive national economy. In our case, however, quite the opposite is true. There has been a continuous drop in production of over 40 per cent in the period 1991-93. There has been a drastic devaluation of the national currency – from 16 leva to the dollar in 1991 to 28 leva in 1993 and 57 leva in May 1994. There has been an upsurge in financial and price profiteering, benefiting no more than 10 per cent of the population. Nearly two-thirds of the population live under the poverty line. In the first four months of 1994 alone, inflation exceeded 40 per cent and the population became a further 30 per cent poorer. Mass closures of enterprises and new mass lay-offs, etc., are also being prepared. All these so-called rehabilitation measures are not accompanied by any programmes for even a minimum of social protection. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that social support for the chosen model of reform is rapidly diminishing. Nearly 70 per cent of the population believe that the path chosen is not the right one.

The trade unions believe that there is no alternative to the "opening" of the Bulgarian economy and its integration into world economic structures. However, history has shown that the internationalization of economic life and the integration of countries at a different level of socio-economic development may have dubious consequences. What are the chances for combining economic growth with social progress within the framework of the monetary programmes recommended by the IMF?

Is the inflow of foreign investment linked automatically to national economic prosperity? How are we to cushion the dire social consequences of this painful process of integration of a collapsed economy into the world economy? In his Report, the Director-General very rightly noted the sharp acceleration in the process of globalization, a process that basically leads to a reformulation of the functions of the national State and to its weakening. But where is the borderline beyond which a State may become a tool in the hands of foreign economic interests? These are some of the difficult questions to be answered today by us as trade unions. Given the early stage of reform in the country, it would be too hasty to try to summarize the possible consequences of the policy of the international financial institutions. We can, however, try to outline some of the problems caused by the approaches adopted by these institutions. Monetary policy is based on the logical assumption that economic growth leads naturally to social prosperity. This thesis has not passed the test of history, which shows that the link between these two phenomena is not at all definite. Without reliable economic mechanisms, economic prosperity is more often than not the prerogative of a handful of people thriving on the impoverishment of considerable masses of the population. In Bulgaria the trade unions have proved to be practically the only barrier against absolute impoverishment and social exclusion. This is probably why trade unions have so far been systematically eliminated from negotiations between the different governments and the international financial institutions. These negotiations have been conducted within a narrow circle of high-ranking state administrators and technocrats blindly following the recommendations. This approach can count on the support of narrow socio-economic strata. Taking account of the processes of impoverishment and introducing systematic consultations with the trade unions would enhance the efficiency of the programmes implemented in the country.

The trade unions have done their best to improve the chances of success of the economic reform while checking the progressive impoverishment of the population. Several times in 1991, 1993 and 1994 we accepted strategic compromises for the sake of a constructive approach and for social and civil peace. Our ability to maintain this balance has already been exhausted because the main resource, the patience of the Bulgarian people, has come to an end. The trade unions are now compelled to act under conditions of growing pressure for change from their members and the overwhelming part of the population.

We are in favour of a reform centred on a real economy and backed by suitable social and political measures. We are for active investment, credit and privatization policy to make the Bulgarian economy competitive on world markets.

The present reform model is doomed to failure, for its depends only on monetary measures that have proved inappropriate for the post-Communist economy. Bulgaria can only be stabilized through a change in the priorities of reform.

The solution of the harsh problems facing Bulgaria and some other countries in the region today cannot be isolated from their joint efforts in collective and coordinated action. This calls for the support of such an authoritative international organization as the ILO.

The election of the representative of the Bulgarian Government as a Vice-President of this session might be viewed as an expression of such support. We have already stated officially our opinion on that issue, but I feel obliged to say that the Bulgarian workers require the Bulgarian Government to have the same attitude towards the ILO and tripartism as the ILO has towards the Bulgarian Government. Unfortunately, Bulgarian governments do not take their obligations under the ILO Constitution seriously. Since 1989 only two countries in Central and Eastern Europe have failed to ratify a single ILO Convention and Bulgaria is one of them. The interruption of the tripartite dialogue several months ago because of the policy of the Bulgarian Government definitely shows that the Government applies double standards in tripartism: one for Geneva and another for the social partners in Bulgaria.

In conclusion, I would like to say that, on the one hand, greater ILO involvement in the formulation of the world's economic and financial policy would contribute to the success of the reforms in Eastern Europe. The ILO could contribute to a change in the relations between East and West by seeking trade liberalization and financial and technical assistance from the developed countries. On the other hand, we believe it is necessary to develop and strengthen the mechanisms of control binding ILO standards and national legislation together.

On behalf of the members of my organization and on my own behalf, I should like to express my appreciation to the ILO and its team for Central and Eastern Europe in Budapest for the steady and consistent support they have given us in these difficult conditions.

Original French: Mr. TSOMAMBET (Minister of Labour, Social Security and Solidarity, Congo) – Allow me on behalf of the Government of the Republic of Congo, of the delegation which I have the honour to lead and on my own behalf to join those who spoke before me in order to congratulate the President most sincerely on the occasion of his brilliant election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the Conference. I hope that he and all those who are working hand in hand with him will be successful in their task. I am convinced that he will be able, through his wisdom, through his experience, to guide our work to important and positive conclusions.

I should also like to thank the Director-General of the ILO for his Report on the status of our Organization since its foundation and for the outline of the perspectives for its future development beyond its 75th anniversary. This Report is a remarkable and decisive contribution to the review we are jointly required to carry out with a view to adapting our Organization to meet the new needs and requirements brought about by the ever-increasing and diversifying demands placed on it.

I should like to take this opportunity to express my satisfaction at the fall of the iniquitous apartheid regime in South Africa after so many joint efforts within the body of this Organization. I warmly greet the return of this country to the large family of the ILO and, at the same time, I offer my support for every effort made by the authorities of that country in extending and consolidating pluralist democracy in a multi-ethnic and multiracial South Africa.

Our Organization is celebrating today the 75th anniversary of its existence in a world full of changes and upheavals. It is an age of maturity, or rather of wisdom, since on the human life scale it is man's third and last period of its existence. The ILO is now a senior citizen. It is therefore a good time to do some in-depth thinking, draw the lessons from what has been achieved on its raison d'être, the principles of its action and the adaptations it needs to make so that it can respond with renewed efficacy to tomorrow's missions and challenges. The ILO was set up to guarantee social justice worldwide. There is no doubt that what it has achieved in 75 years is important; however, this will not be continued into the future unless it absorbs the numerous and important upheavals currently taking place.

The changes that occurred at the beginning of the 1990s are at least as, if not more important than, those which took place after the Second World War, particularly if we consider the political upheavals in Eastern Europe and in Africa. The efforts of the United Nations system since the end of the war have not produced the results hoped for because poverty and misery have not given much ground – in fact they have even progressed in some countries of the Third World. This is the case in Africa where the situation is still under the impact of the recession, the rise in unemployment and the fall in gross national product.

The brutal acceleration of the process of economic globalization, the generalization of structural adjustment programmes imposed by international financial organizations have aggravated the impoverishment of the population and social misery. In this context, the Congo approves the new "active partnership policy" instituted by the ILO; this should give pride of place to offering Africans and their technical services the expertise they need to devote themselves usefully to the essential tasks of promoting legislative reforms and an active and concrete programme of employment promotion accompanied by short- and medium-term training programmes. To this end, the multidisciplinary teams which will soon be fanning out through our continent should be made up of highly experienced specialists more interested in local concerns than in acting as "missionaries" responsible for imposing the ideas of the headquarters.

These multidisciplinary teams will be effective only if they concentrate their action on the concrete concerns of our States, employers and workers. They should aid African States to plan, and to avoid and eliminate the negative consequences of structural adjustment measures on our populations – and in particular to the most vulnerable segments.

In this connection, the emphasis should be placed upon the training of national agents to be involved in the design, implementation and evaluation of projects.

Tripartism is one of the ILO's major strengths and constitutes an original mechanism for defining and implementing social policies. We are very happy that this mechanism has now become established in Africa. After several years of procrastination, the Labour Commission of the Organization of African Unity, where governments previously had monopoly representation, was in 1992 converted into a tripartite body in the image of the ILO.

But tripartism has its requirements, and can be effective only if the workers' and in particular employers' representatives have the knowledge and training needed to discuss with government representatives on an equal footing.

In African countries in general and in the Congo in particular, the matter is of key importance since steps must be taken so that both trade union representatives and labour administration staff can be brought up to date and given general training about the new rules regulating the operation of a market economy. ILO cooperation and technical assistance programmes should make due allowance for these requirements and grant them priority.

Finally, although tripartism is a precious institution, my Government shares the analysis linking in the new social actors closer to the economic problems and stakes at play. It is within this framework, that a special place should be reserved for the informal sector, cooperatives and mutual benefit societies in the implementation of social dialogue and collective bargaining.

The preparation of international standards has been a cornerstone of the ILO's activities since its creation.

This standard setting will attain its objective of social justice only if these standards take into account the diversity of the local situation and the potential of member States. The material and administrative difficulties that, for example, African States have in implementing their obligations under these standards are a perfect illustration of this need. We greet in this connection the ILO's efforts over the years, in grassroots missions, to reduce and solve by dialogue the difficulties encountered.

As to the structures of the ILO, my Government supports fully the reforms that have been taken over the years. Nevertheless, the ILO can be actually considered as the world's "social conscience" and an organization at the service of its constituents only if all its member States feel themselves fully involved in its operation.

In this connection, we encourage the Director-General and exhort him to seek ways and means to rejuvenate the ILO, and to strengthen the representivity and the responsibility of African management in its top structures.

The Congo, in the same way as other States, wishes to make its modest contribution to the celebration of this 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The vast programme of legislative reform undertaken over the past few months was directed not only at adapting our legal arsenal to the new liberal context but also – with ILO and UNDP support – to harmonize our legislation with the relevant provisions of international labour standards.

A series of instruments adopted by the ILO – many of which deal with freedom and fundamental human rights – are currently passing through the submission procedure prior to examination by Parliament. Once this procedure has been concluded our country will be able to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO in its own way by doubling the number of ratified Conventions. In our opinion, there is no more significant way for us to engrave such an event in the collective consciousness of our people.

Our Organization has already provided proof of its ability to adapt to the numerous changes and upheavals which have occurred in the world since its creation.

On the eve of the third millennium and in a world seeking a new balance between the State, the market and social society, the work of the ILO should more than ever be permanently striving for and promoting social justice throughout the world.

It is in this way, and with the support of all its constituents that the ILO will be able to take up the numerous challenges of the future that can be seen on the horizon.

Long live international cooperation! Long live the 75th anniversary of the ILO! Long live the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia!

Original Russian: Mr. SHMAKOV (Workers' delegate, Russian Federation) – First of all, let me congratulate the President on his election to such high office, which is even more important because this is an anniversary session. This is a tribute to his achievements and guarantees that we will make a valuable contribution to the work of this session of the Conference.

We agree with the conclusion contained in the Report of the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, to the effect that the scale and intensity of geo-political developments in today's world render it necessary "to make a new overall assessment of the ILO's aims and means of action".

The Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Russia agrees with the Director-General that as the ILO celebrates its 75th anniversary, it should, together with the whole international community, affirm "its belief in social justice as one of its fundamental values and its determination to further this cause" and "its confidence in active tripartism as a motivating force".

We feel that to give practical content to these hopes and aspirations we need, inter alia, an objective analysis of the situation at the national level in all sections of the Organization.

The globalization of the economy, which has rightly been given a prominent place in the Report, is accompanied by the globalization of the significance of standards and criteria of the ILO, "a convergence between the basic principles of democratic societies and the values espoused by the ILO". But we have to see the reverse side of these processes – the globalization of world problems linked through "the triumph of the market economy", to use the terms in the Report.

The transition to the market economy and changes in forms of property are accompanied by a rapid growth in social disparities. The world is facing serious distortions in the sphere of labour and alarming changes in labour relationships.

According to the new Constitution in my country, Russia is a social State. Many organizations, including our trade union federation, have signed a national agreement on consensus. The principles of tripartism are extolled from many high tribunes. We can but welcome this, but we are deeply concerned at what is happening against this seemingly favourable background.

Production continues to fall sharply. Last year all branches and services were affected, with the fall reaching 16.2 per cent in industry. The number of unemployed or partially employed totalled almost 8 million which is over 10 per cent of the active population. According to forecasts, in 1994, the total number of fully or partially unemployed will rise to 12.1 million people, some 16 per cent of the economically active population.

The sharp growth in unemployment could activate a process leading to an additional cumulative reduction in business activity. The most rapidly emerging phenomenon is what is known as "macroeconomic hysteresis". In other words, in addition to the basic reason for the growth of unemployment – the pressure of consumer and investment demand – its growth will be determined by the dynamics of unemployment of preceding periods. As a result, unemployment will become self-perpetuating and cause a second slump, generated by unemployment as a result of stagnation.

Having noted the complexity and importance of this problem, we support the specific and far-reaching proposals of the Director-General of the ILO on how it can cooperate at the world level to solve employment problems. In particular, we look forward to the publication of an annual report on employment and incomes and support the holding of regular meetings of the Governing Body on employment and the inclusion on the agenda of the International Labour Conference of a standing item on this issue.

Social stratification has taken hold as never before. The difference in income between the 10 per cent of the richest and the poorest sectors of the population is twenty-sevenfold. At every third enterprise there are delays in payment of wages. Debt in areas financed from federal funds are one-and-a-half times higher than the total monthly wage fund for the country. Consumer prices have risen by 10 per cent. Working conditions and occupational safety and health have declined radically – every year approximately 400,000 people are injured at work, and 8,000 of those injuries are fatal. In our opinion it is intolerable that deals to generate more employment should be made at the expense of workers' protection.

If we extrapolate this further, to the problem of employment, we are pleased to note that the ILO, as the Director-General pointed out, has always supported the connection between job creation and basic labour legislation. We consider that it is unacceptable to strike a deal whereby there are more jobs but there is less protection for the workers.

We do not want to confine ourselves merely to drawing up "check lists" of the social and economic problems of Russia. But if we are to protect social values, and if we aspire to achieve the change, to which the Director-General refers in his Report, then we have to be clear, realistic and responsible in our approach.

Yes, Russian trade unions support a market economy. But they support a market economy that enables everyone to provide, using their own hands and their own thoughts, for a life of dignity for themselves and for their families.

We have no intention to sit idly by as new social foundations are established, nor do we plan on playing the role of detractors. We are going to play our proper part as trade unions and protect the rights of people at work.

In so doing, we face many difficulties. Certain powerful interests are trying to limit the rights of workers, overturn social guarantees and weaken the trade unions. We can see this in attempts to emasculate labour legislation, to cut off the social insurance fund, to put the ratification of ILO Conventions on hold or to observe ratified Conventions in a selective manner.

To be quite frank, we do not believe that the universality and effectiveness of the ILO will stand to gain if its supervisory machinery is weakened or if it adopts so-called "soft laws". Of course, if the ILO takes this path, it could become the abstract "social conscience" of the United Nations. But it will certainly not in that case be an authoritative and objective arbiter in the settlement of labour disputes. And if it is not, the well-being and the very lives of millions of destitute people will be in danger as this world becomes more integrated. Optional or selective implementation of freely assumed obligations could well undermine the foundations of international law. Putting the perpetrators and the victims of social injustices in the same boat in an attempt at absolute universality is certainly not an appropriate way to replace the struggle against communism from which the ILO drew its energy all these years.

We interpret the universality of the ILO not as a desire to include everyone without distinction, but as the universality of its ideals and principles, shared by all who voluntarily take part in the Organization. Our trade union federation has proposed to the President of Russia to give priority to the ratification of 17 ILO Conventions. We are pleased that Mr. Yeltsin has indicated that preparations are under way for the ratification of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

The growth of international trade raises the question of the relationship between trade and the observance of labour standards. International competition must not take place based on the over-exploitation of workers. We agree that there should be closer coordination between the ILO and the GATT and we favour the adoption of a new ILO Convention to ensure that the opening of markets and liberalization of trade go hand in hand with improving conditions of life and work. This could be considered at the World Summit for Social Development and also as part of the future cooperation between the ILO and the newly-created World Trade Organization.

In conclusion, I would like to express the conviction that the growth of confidence in the ILO and strengthening of its influence in the world community will be based on an equitable interaction between its constituents, the social partners in each country.

Original French: Mr. TODORAN (Workers' delegate, Romania) – First of all, I would like to congratulate the President, on behalf of the Romanian trade union movement and on my own behalf, on his election to this highly responsible position. We wish him every success in his work at this session of the International Labour Conference, to which millions of workers look with great hope and trust.

In fact, the work of the Conference was started at a time when, as is mentioned in the Report of the Director-General, values and achievements must not only be preserved, but above all be adapted to the standard-setting activities, to the needs and to the very raison d'être of an organization such as the ILO.

In this commemorative year, at a time when we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the ILO, we have the possibility of remembering that this Organization is the only international forum where representatives of workers, governments and employers meet on an equal footing.

That is why it has an even more important role to play in finding ways and means of eliminating poverty, extending the protection of workers and creating jobs which are covered by international labour standards.

Of course, we workers, together with employers and government representatives meeting at the ILO, have to think in a serious and forward-looking fashion and try to outline the way in which we see our societies tomorrow, so as the better to adjust our policies and demands, as well as our activities at national and international level.

In an economy which is becoming more globalized now that totalitarianism has receded throughout the world, leading to many disorders and uncertainties, as the Director-General brilliantly outlined in his Report, we see with concern the difficult situation of trade unionism, and if we do not direct our thinking, together with the other two partners, towards trade unionism of a kind that the new type of globalized economy needs, we shall, perhaps, find ourselves in a situation where the very role of the ILO is questioned in a society of communication and information. That is why we must raise our voices and prepare ourselves for a commitment at this time, on the occasion of this anniversary, to give the ILO a new role to play in the international community.

In changing societies, where changes are becoming more and more numerous on the part of governments and employers, the trade unions must take the initiative and not forget that they are certainly the forces of contention and opposition but, at the same time, they have the force to propose and to strike a new balance in our new societies.

The economics in transition in Eastern and Central Europe are now in a very difficult situation, with a considerable growth of inequalities in income which is not softened by other growths. There is a rapid drop in production, massive unemployment, and a great increase in the level of poverty.

Romania has not been spared by this process and, unfortunately, the social and economic situation since the last session has not been encouraging.

Every day the gap between the declared objectives of economic reform, approved at the beginning by the majority of our trade unions, and the practical results of its implementation, is growing.

Increasing unemployment, the impoverishment of a considerable part of the population, and the economic and financial freezes, lead, amongst other things, to mounting discontent and a loss of credibility of those in power today.

The increasing social tensions are due to the fact that in theory we have many rights, such as social protection rights, which are even enshrined in legal texts. But, in practice, even those who get these social benefits get derisory sums, and even the minimum salary cannot ensure for the Romanian worker a decent standard of living to which he has a right: in most cases he is living below the subsistence level.

I can tell you that the minimum salary covers only 26 per cent of subsistence needs. It is true that amongst the rights legally guaranteed in Romania we have a Law which proclaims freedom of negotiation, but national legislation – especially wage legislation – is limited by the amendment which allows the Government to adopt measures to moderate the salary increase during certain limited periods.

We are now in a strange situation where the freedom of salary and wage negotiation is limited by government decision, whereas the freed prices are not restricted in any way.

Although there is an indexation committee which should, in principle, monitor the relationship between wages and purchasing power, there is no system of coordinating the indexation.

That is why, as responsible social partners, we are unhappy about the methods of implementation of government programmes which have led to very high social costs, and which are soon going to become unacceptable.

We would like, from this rostrum, to express our discontent at the very poor results that our Government has been able to achieve in respect of implementing the tripartite system: namely, the setting up of an economic and social council, which could perhaps lower tensions in an official framework or on the basis of democratic tripartite consultation systems, and which could also promote the instruments necessary for social progress.

We have to denounce the fact that, for example, the modifications and the amendments mentioned by our Minister of Labour in his statement on the Unemployment Act were made without consulting the social partners.

It is quite clear that we need time, but we should not confuse this idea with a procrastination policy, which continually postpones the establishment of institutions to accelerate the privatization process, create new jobs by redeploying workers, eliminate all forms of exploitation and improve the working conditions of the workers.

In this context the trade unions have shown that they can play an active role through their initiatives and specific solutions, but only if the legal framework becomes more flexible and capable of transforming these solutions into law.

Therefore we have to work together, we the workers' organizations, so that the process of profound and progressive change can take place rapidly. It is quite clear that in taking up this challenge we shall still need to recreate solidarity the better to defend our interests and regain our dynamism and our authority.

It is in this context that we should understand the affirmation made by the Director-General in the conclusions to his Report, namely, that "it will be difficult to promote social justice if we do not very quickly identify ways and means of regulating the world economy". This can help us in our future dialogue with our social partners. Allow me to say that I fully agree with the diagnosis and with the complex and apposite way of discussing new viable strategies which can easily be adapted to the specific condition of the new globalized economy, which we are entering now.

Mr. OWUOR (representative, Pan-African Employers' Confederation) – May I congratulate the President and Vice-Presidents on their unanimous election. I am confident that under their wise guidance this Conference will achieve its desired results. The Pan-African Employers' Confederation extends its warmest congratulations to the ILO on the occasion of its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

May I also at the outset congratulate the Director-General on his bold Report which gives his vision of the future of the ILO. Although one may not entirely agree with some of his conclusions, one cannot help but admire the clarity of his thought and the honesty of his analysis.

It was the Employers' group of the Governing Body that first drew the Director-General's attention to the need for a thorough reform of the ILO, so as to enable it to meet the growing demands of its constituents in a rapidly changing world. It is therefore gratifying to note that in his Report, the Director-General has placed before this Conference a breathtaking agenda for change. The dual mandate of the ILO is to contribute to the promotion of universal and lasting peace through social justice and to wage a relentless war against poverty. The ILO tries to achieve these objectives through research and information, direct contacts, meetings, standards and technical cooperation.

The ILO has emerged as a reputable international centre of excellence for social research. Thus, the proposal by the Director-General to supplement its current publications with analyses that would assist policy-makers in dealing with difficult social questions deserves careful consideration. Countries undergoing structural adjustment as a result of the debt crisis desperately require studies on specific country programmes of action to militate against the social effects of structural adjustment, conflict resolutions, and the harmonization of ILO standards with employment creation. Also, judging from the excellent outcome of the Informal Tripartite Meeting at the Ministerial Level on Employment, held on 10 June 1994, it is worthwhile for the Conference to give support to the Director-General's proposal to organize high-powered annual informal meetings on broad social policy issues, with the participation of the representatives of Bretton Woods institutions and other donor agencies.

The Confederation welcomes the requirement that all United Nations agencies should now concentrate on providing technical guidance and policy advice within their areas of competence and relative competitive advantage, thereby placing project execution in the hands of national bodies. In this regard, the ILO can still play a significant role in providing the social partners with technical assistance in the preparation of project proposals, monitoring and evaluation.

The Confederation shares the Director-General's optimism that his active partnership policy, supplemented with the establishment of multidisciplinary teams, will result in greater concentration of efforts and resources, greater emphasis on strengthening national capacity and greater coherence amongst the different forms of ILO action. However, for this policy to succeed, the Director-General will need to allow for increased flexibility in the exchange of staff from one multidisciplinary team to the other and from Headquarters to the sub-regions, and the Director-General will need to ensure that all areas of ILO activities are represented in the multidisciplinary teams. The Confederation, however, notes with concern that whereas nationals of some regions are generously represented in Africa, there appear to be no more than one or two Africans represented in the multidisciplinary teams or area offices in other regions. As the Director-General notes, "the ILO cannot be a schizophrenic organization. It cannot affirm certain principles and then turn around and ignore those principles in its practical action."

The Confederation would like to see the principle of non-discrimination in deployment of ILO field staff observed in practice. There is also a need to correct the current imbalance of African representation, especially in senior positions within the Office. The Confederation appreciates the laudable efforts by the Director-General in increasing ILO assistance to employers' organizations in Africa. The ILO assistance has enabled these organizations to develop their institutional capacities, especially in the fields of public policy and social dialogue as well as in strengthening their service delivery systems to their members. African employers will continue to need increased assistance in the fields of professional leadership, research, entrepreneurship development, productivity improvement, human resource development and managing the effects of trade liberalization and privatization programmes.

The Director-General should be thanked for acknowledging in his Report on the activities of the ILO in 1992-93 that employers have a right to be recognized as equal partners with governments and workers in a world of ever-accelerating social and economic change, since the employers are the leading engine for change. However, we do not share his pessimism that the end of communism has exacerbated confrontations between employers and workers. If anything, there appears to be a greater active mutual respect between the two social partners.

Granted that the ILO technical programmes have met some of the employers' concerns in the field, these interests would better be served by placing all employers, and enterprise activities within one unified command so as to facilitate better coordination of these activities. The Confederation, therefore, looks forward to the appointment of a senior officer to oversee these activities in the Office.

The Director-General's Report has toyed with the idea of the ILO enforcing economic and political sanctions against those countries which fail to comply with those Conventions which they have ratified, under the so-called "social clause". Making access of exporting countries' products to international markets conditional upon compliance by these countries with certain basic ILO standards, is contrary to the principles of free trade and constitutes an attempt to deny, especially developing countries, access to the markets of industrialized countries. It is my opinion that improvements in labour conditions would depend on freer movements of goods rather than on introducing measures which are in restraint of trade. Apart from suffering the trap of an unbearable debt burden, a low technological base, inadequate infrastructure and low productivity, most developing countries suffer also from wildly fluctuating earnings from their primary products. Even with the best of intentions, therefore, they cannot provide the same kind of conditions of service or guarantee the same minimum standard of incomes or social protection as pertains to industrialized countries.

Just as the ILO may not have been justified in withdrawing technical assistance from countries that violate its standards, thus punishing the guilty governments and the victims alike, the Director-General is equally unjustified in trying to popularize social clause agreements in international trade whose most spectacular achievement would be to impoverish further the developing world's poor peasants and farm workers. In this case, the ILO would be unwittingly spreading poverty throughout the developing world instead of combating it. The ILO's strength must rely on moral persuasion rather than on controversial coercive measures such as boycotts of goods.

The Director-General proposes the possibility of the ILO's structure being tinkered with to seek the representation of or collaboration with NGOs and other groups that are currently engaged in promoting social justice. The ILO already provides some of these groups with observer status and they have an opportunity to address the Conference. To confer upon them the same status as that which is conferred upon the current ILO constituents, is to question the very raison d'être of the ILO and to discredit its tripartite pillars.

Given these far-reaching and somewhat controversial proposals of the Director-General, it may be desirable for the Governing Body to set up a tripartite task force to examine the implications of some of these proposals, taking account of the comments that have emerged from this session.

In conclusion, may I join the previous speakers in welcoming the readmission into ILO membership of a new democratic South Africa. I particularly welcome the formation of Business South Africa – a non-racial representative body of employers which has already taken its rightful place amongst the employers of the world. The Pan-African Employers' Confederation looks forward to working closely with the new body.

Mr. MALHOTRA (representative of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) – On behalf of the Director-General of UNESCO, Mr. Federico Mayor, we would like to thank you for your gracious invitation to attend the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. We would also like to take this opportunity to express our most sincere congratulations on the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Seventy-five years of continuous involvement in one of the fields most crucial to the process of human and social development have justifiably earned the ILO the title of the elder sister of the United Nations system. In a communication addressed to the Director-General of ILO on this happy 75th anniversary, our Director-General has said, and I quote: "Today, in a world where political and economic dogmas alike are gradually relinquishing their grip, ILO with its unique tripartite chemistry of decision-making and international cooperation stands in the forefront of the system in many of its areas of activities related to the improvement of living and working conditions and to human resources development, including in the fields where UNESCO is proud to have been closely associated with it, especially in vocational and technical education and training. On behalf of UNESCO, I salute the achievements of ILO."

In another specific area of critical concern and overall human development, which relates to the status of teachers, ILO and UNESCO have had a long association of cooperative programmes. Under this programme, UNESCO and the ILO undertake a number of activities at global, regional and national levels involving representatives of governments, teachers' associations and the private sector, such as in the training workshops, studies, and seminars on different aspects of the teaching profession.

The Sixth Ordinary Session of the Joint Committee is scheduled at the ILO in July 1994 and its report will no doubt provide suggestions for future actions by the two organizations in relation to education and training requirements of teachers, as well as to basic working conditions that would be provided so that they are conducive to effective teaching and learning.

In the developing world, in perhaps the last 15 years a period of economic crisis and structural adjustment has prevailed; in this prolonged context of austerity most countries have experienced and continue to experience negative developments in their education and training systems, among which the deterioration in quality and decline in access are the most prominent manifestations.

Both the ILO and UNESCO have a worldwide mandate to exercise leadership in the development of human resources. Both organizations consider it their responsibility to focus their attention on the impact of financial constraints on human resources development with a view to assisting adjusting countries to protect their education and training sectors. As specialized United Nations agencies, they have an objective and well-recognized neutrality in their pragmatic efforts. As truly international institutions with no limiting geopolitical or commercial interests, they are welcome partners to nearly all countries. They have close contact with ministries responsible for social programmes, as well as with the education and training institutions.

At the same time, they also understand and speak in the language of both the funding agencies and the training institutions. The extensive and rich experience in human resources development of both the ILO and UNESCO enables them to create programmes for education and training that stress both equity and efficiency.

As the mandates of both organizations reinforce each other, we are confident that this Conference, being held on its 75th anniversary, will lead to an enhanced spirit of cooperation between our organizations. We, for our part, pledge our continued, full cooperation with the ILO in our common endeavour to contribute to the establishment of universal and lasting peace for the promotion of social justice. We firmly believe that peace and development are indivisible.

The Director-General, in his Report, has underscored this point. Therefore, in this context, our cooperation will go a long way in promoting a multilateral approach of improving respect for workers, workers' rights, and promoting social progress throughout the world which implies guaranteeing the right to development of each individual.

Mr. NYAMUHOKYA (Workers' delegate, United Republic of Tanzania) – Allow me to start this short statement by congratulating Mr Gray on his election to the post of President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

This year, the ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It is befitting therefore to re-examine the role of the ILO in the light of the rampant abrogation of values enshrined in the ILO Constitution, which in essence calls for the defence of social justice. This is a precondition for lasting peace in the world of yesterday, today and tomorrow.

Now, because of time constraints, I would like to touch upon a few issues which are of great relevance to my country, the United Republic of Tanzania.

The future work of the ILO must be viewed in the light of the structural adjustment programmes inspired by the IMF and the World Bank and taken on board by most governments in sub-Saharan Africa. The implementation of these programmes has caused untold miseries to the working men and women of these countries. People have lost jobs and they are now destitute, roaming the streets of most major towns in our countries, often earning their living through legally unfair and foul means.

In Tanzania, for example, over the last three years no less than 100,000 workers have lost their jobs in the public and private sector because of the economic liberalization policy which is being implemented. This also means that trade unions have lost many members and have therefore become weak. But assuming that each of the retrenched workers has four people to support, a situation which is quite normal in African society, then almost 400,000 people have no means to support themselves and this is a serious situation which cannot be left to continue. Where is social justice? Where is the ILO, whose task it is to prevent unemployment?

In these countries there is a mass devaluation of currencies, high inflation and hence the constant rise of commodity prices, including essential ones. Wages are very low and there seems to be no effort on the part of the authorities to raise wages above the poverty line. In Tanzania the gap between the earnings of workers in the highest wage bracket and of those in the lowest wage bracket is widening. It is one to 30. The minimum wage is just above US$10 a month against a cost of living of about US$150 a month. In such a situation crime has increased and there can definitely be no lasting peace. Where is the ILO in executing one of its mandates? Where is the provision of an adequate living wage?

No, something must be done and done quickly, otherwise peace will not prevail in these countries. While some people attribute the wars in Rwanda, Burundi and Somalia to tribal or clan differences, the root cause, I think, is the inequitable distribution of wealth – the haves continue to get more and the have-nots continue to lose even the little that they have. I should imagine that this was true in South Africa. The few whites did not want to share their wealth with the majority of poor blacks. Now that apartheid is over, we are looking forward to a just society in South Africa and hence to a lasting peace there. We welcome the tripartite delegation of South Africa to the ILO family and pray that social justice will now be in place, thus creating lasting peace.

The economic development of a country cannot be the monopoly of the government. All social partners are supposed to be connected with such development and they must participate. The business community, intellectuals, students, women and every person of goodwill would like to see prosperity in his or her country. It is important that the spirit of tripartism prevails in all the economic endeavours of a country. For this reason, I endorse the Director-General's comments on tripartism. I agree with him when he says that tripartism is a highly effective agent for change as well as a necessary component of real democracy. Let governments pay no lip service to this principle – let them implement it. I say this because my own Government does not seem to be serious about this matter. It only does so when it is convenient, but usually it does not consult workers, even on issues concerning them directly. Every year we come to the International Labour Conference to reaffirm our stand with regard to ILO goals and objectives. This meeting is no talking-shop but a forum which serious-minded people attend in order to address issues confronting the world community, especially pertaining to labour. So whatever we say and whatever we do, we must ask ourselves one fundamental question: How does the worker benefit from our actions and what will the consequence of our words and deeds be to the world at large?

Governments have often been rigid, not flexible, and frequently unprepared for change. The time has come for them to have a vision of the development and the welfare of their people. We in the Third World do not need the IMF and the World Bank to tell us what our vision for the year 2000 should be, for example. We should know and tell the World Bank and the IMF what we want. It is in this connection that I would like to conclude my remarks by touching upon the social clause.

We need to support the inclusion of a social clause in this year's conclusions, in as far as the social clause is in favour of the workers of the world. Who is not for freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining? Who is not against employment of youth and children below a certain age who should be at school? Who wants discrimination? Who is against equitable distribution of income? And who wants forced labour?

The workers of the world would be well off with a social clause and would definitely be better protected. I therefore urge everybody to support the social clause and reaffirm their commitment to the following ILO Conventions: the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105).

Mr. RWAMURA KASWARRA (Employers' delegate, Uganda) – On behalf of the employers in Uganda, whom I have the honour to represent, and on my own behalf, I congratulate the President on his well-deserved election.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO calls for celebration. The ILO, in the last seven and a half decades, has been instrumental in advocating of social peace and social justice in the world. The 81st Session of the Conference gives us the opportunity to take stock and review future prospects of the ILO.

I congratulate the Director-General for an excellent Report focusing on defending values and promoting change. Indeed, as the Employers' group has stressed in the last year or so, changes in the ILO are inevitable if our Organization is to continue meeting global social and economic challenges.

Employers are grateful to the ILO for the role it has played over the years in the fight against apartheid in South Africa. The end of apartheid in South Africa was the most important event on that continent, as Africa is now totally free of colonial and apartheid domination.

Before I comment on the Director-General's Report, let me briefly comment on the recent progress Uganda has made. Uganda has recently been described as a country on the move. We have a progressive leadership and a Government that is sensitive to economic, social and political development. The macroeconomic policies in place have ushered in economic stability and economic growth of 5 per cent annually. The shilling is stable and fully convertible. Inflation is running below 10 per cent annually. The investment code recently put in place has attractive incentives, and investors both from the region and beyond are beginning to invest in Uganda.

Politically, Uganda has a good record of human rights. It has a broad-based Government incorporating different political opinions and a truly free press. A constituent assembly was popularly elected in March 1994 to review the Constitution that should provide a strong foundation for a democratic process.

In April this year, we had the privilege of welcoming the ILO Deputy Director-General, Mrs. Chinery-Hesse, not only to Uganda but to the Federation of Uganda Employers' headquarters. Mrs. Chinery-Hesse was in Uganda to attend the Regional Ministerial Informal Sector Conference and commemorate the ILO's 75th anniversary.

In the last 75 years, the ILO has been preoccupied by standard-setting that has regulated labour practices in global economies as well as advocating social peace and justice.

The challenge in the coming years, as we see it, will be to address acute unemployment and escalating poverty by strengthening tripartism, promoting enterprise and the entrepreneurial spirit, the democratization process and guaranteeing social peace and justice.

Employment creation should remain high on the ILO agenda. This is all the more so when structural adjustment programmes, currently under way in Africa, have created massive redundancies. In Uganda, for instance, thousands of people have been retrenched from the public and the private sectors, as well as from the armed forces, to meet structural adjustment programme requirements. The ILO could assist in the retraining of such people so that they are re-employed.

Jobs are mainly created by enterprises. In order to have productive and sustainable employment, the ILO should help member States to create an enabling environment for enterprise development.

In his Report to the Eighth African Regional Conference in Mauritius in February this year, the Director-General pointed out that, during the 1990s and the following years, private enterprises and entrepreneurial spirit would play an increasingly important role in accelerating economic development, cutting unemployment and uneven income distribution among social groups and lowering the negative impact of structural adjustments.

We must seek to eliminate poverty and deprivation in the developing countries, in which large sectors of the population are the victims of unemployment and low standards of living.

The Declaration of Philadelphia made a specific reference to poverty in its now widely quoted phrase, "poverty anywhere is a threat to prosperity everywhere". In the last decade or so, the gap between the poor and the rich nations has been increasing. Equally worrying is the gap between the poor and rich in our societies, and this is a constant source of insecurity.

The homeless and the street children in large cities, the famine- stricken populations in some African countries, are a sore sight. We wish to call upon the ILO to do everything in its power to combat poverty. In the fight against poverty, the ILO should continue exploring the opportunities offered by the informal sector in generating jobs, creating wealth and in the distribution of goods and services in the remote communities.

There are those who believe that the informal sector is unstructured and operates on the fringe of the formal sector. The ILO should take up the challenges in the years ahead to assist member countries in creating those conditions that will improve the functioning of this vibrant sector, enabling it to graduate into the formal sector.

Tripartism, in our view, will remain the ILO's cornerstone. At the national level, tripartism forms the framework which facilitates the social partners to have constructive dialogue leading to the conclusion of important collective agreements. Tripartism is increasingly used to reach voluntary understanding on those issues that lead to the well-being of the enterprise, as well as ensuring social peace and justice at the workplace.

The Director-General's Report refers to the strengthening of tripartism. We believe that any strengthening of tripartism should focus on how tripartism can function more efficiently and effectively. We do not share the Director-General's view that tripartism should be strengthened by expanding it to cover other intermediary groups and representatives of general interests, whose goals and objectives have no bearing on how business is run. Tripartite negotiations should continue to be held between the social partners, namely government, employers and workers.

Regarding technical cooperation and standards, we are opposed to any linkage between technical cooperation and international labour standards. To tie technical cooperation to the ratification of standards is to diminish the importance of technical cooperation.

We believe that technical cooperation, like standards, was conceived as one of the means available to achieve ILO objectives as set out in the Declaration of Philadelphia. ILO standards, due to their rigidities, are being ratified by fewer and fewer countries. On the other hand, due to its flexibility, technical cooperation has become popular and it is being embraced by more and more member States, especially in the developing countries and the countries of Eastern Europe.

Considering that the developing countries are the major beneficiaries of technical cooperation programmes, and that they are among those countries in the ILO who have ratified the majority of the ILO Conventions, any linkage between standards and technical cooperation will push the developing countries to ratify more Conventions than developed countries. This in itself will create an imbalance within ILO membership.

The multidisciplinary teams, now established to cover all the ILO's member States, are an innovation that is noted with appreciation. These teams will bring services closer to the ILO constituents. The team covering eastern Africa was in Uganda in April 1994. Having seen them at work, I was left to wonder whether the scope they are expected to cover, both in content and territory, will not overwhelm the experts and make them less efficient.

As I conclude, I wish to state that I endorse the statement delivered to this Conference by Mr. Costas Kapartis, Secretary-General of the International Organization of Employers.

Original Arabic: Mr. DAHLAN (Employers' delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful! On behalf of the private sector of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, I should like to congratulate the President and through him the International Labour Organization on its 75th anniversary, an international organization that brings together the tripartite components of the productive sector, which was established for the achievement of common goals and assists in building mutually supportive and balanced societies, an organization with a venerable history of action on behalf of the world of work in the form of international conventions which have given rise to regulations, legislation, plans and policies that have helped to build the world economy, to raise the level of culture of its peoples, to promote reflection and creativity and to consolidate the notion of mutual cooperation among the three social partners.

The confidence shown in the President in the form of his unanimous election by this Conference is proof of the democratic functioning of this multilateral organization and of the fair apportionment of tasks and responsibilities among the partners. It is also a token of the high esteem of the Conference for his personal competence and for his service to the cause of joint action.

The Director-General's Report to this session covers subjects of great importance, beginning with his review of the role of the 75-year-old Organization, moving on to the vital subject referred to in the title Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

It is a subject of great importance in the lives of all sectors of the population and we in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia are proud of the fact that we have a system that guarantees social justice and freedom, assuring everyone access to their rights, in particular human rights. Moreover, there is equality between all sectors of society in terms of rights and responsibility.

One of the subjects in the Director-General's Report that attracted out attention was the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, inasmuch our country, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, is playing an active role in supporting and developing them, a policy of great importance to the labour market and to exporters of human resources throughout the world.

As our economy is a strong and solid one, our development plans provide for major economic projects that attract specialized and technical local and foreign personnel. Labour regulations and legislation in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia create an ideal climate for work and production, protecting the rights of local and foreign workers equally in terms of rights and duties, providing private employment agencies with complete freedom in accordance with the existing regulations and legislation, and giving them the opportunity to select appropriate qualified personnel to work in the public sector of the economy. It further leaves the public sector free to cooperate and coordinate with private employment agencies to meet their needs for personnel under the supervision of the public employment agencies, which ensure the proper functioning of the process in accordance with the rules and standards in force.

With a view to supporting private employment agencies, the Ministry of Labour of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia recently authorized the establishment of local private employment agencies to assist in local employment processes.

Chambers of Commerce and Industry in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia are playing an active and constructive role in support of training and retraining programmes for workers in the light of the needs of the private sector through training centres run by the Chambers of Commerce working alongside the training centres run by the State.

Part II of the Director-General's Report contains a detailed account of the budget for technical assistance, which has had favourable and effective results in support of technical cooperation programmes in the region to which we belong. The rate of support for such programmes has increased, realizing to some extent our hopes and aspirations. At all events, it is a step in the right direction which we hope will continue, in view of its major role in raising productivity and developing human resources.

The principles of the ILO that we cherish stress the importance of strengthening social justice, freedom of association, protection of the social partners and of the rights of workers, and outlaw oppression, deprivation and violation of workers' rights. It is our constant wish and concern to support those principles.

Our celebration of the 75th anniversary of the ILO coincides with a number of other celebrations throughout the world, some of which represent a turning point in the economies of the modern world. The formation of economic blocs in the Americas and Europe and other agreements being coordinated in other parts of the world are bringing to light the economic characteristics of the new world economic order.

The celebration of the signing of the GATT world trade agreement, which specialists from all over the world persisted in coordinating and preparing until the world as a whole was prepared to subscribe to it, will have a major impact in terms of increasing the volume of trade, freeing exports, creating new markets, reducing unemployment, encouraging labour mobility and supporting job creation. Moreover, the agreement will make a positive contribution towards achieving the aims of this Organization in the near future.

This is the year of economic and political celebration. The ILO's struggle over decades to end racial discrimination has paid off this year with South Africa's membership in our Organization after the victory of democracy and freedom, equality and social justice. I welcome South Africa as an eminent Member of our Organization.

With regard to the Asian continent, we have taken part in the celebrations relating to the peace agreement between the Palestinians and the Israelis, the result of constructive efforts on the part of the international community and its commitment to peace and justice in accordance with the right to work and the ILO's principles. We hope that with increased support we will move towards peace and guarantee the rights of the peoples of this major region of the world.

Finally, I would like to congratulate our brother State of Oman, which has just joined the ILO, and hope that its membership will have a positive impact on the Organization's activities.

I would also like to congratulate South Africa and the new member States of our Organization.

I have the greatest respect for all gathered here and wish you every success in this session of the Conference.

May God bless you with His peace, mercy and grace.

Original French: Mr. VITTORI (representative, Pax Christi International) – Let me vary the sacred formula and congratulate the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on having, through its President and through paid tribute to the workers the raison d'être of the ILO.

These 75 years of existence while undoubtedly impressive, should not tempt us to relax in our work. It is the genius of our predecessors that they cause the international community to agree that "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries" (preamble to the Constitution).

At the outset, harmonization of labour conditions was intended only to improve such conditions. Today the preservation of essential social acquired rights is challenged by a liberalism which the collapse of the Communist system brought to triumph.

There was fear of the spread of proletarian dictatorship for which the Soviet had seized power in Moscow, and therefore tripartism established itself as a reasonable and positive substitute for the class struggle.

The collapse of dictatorships, which were in no country a dictatorship of the proletariat, paradoxically creates the danger of another dictatorship to replace it. It does not speak its name but is increasingly spreading its tentacles with the globalization of the economy.

Money has no fatherland and knows no borders, physical or moral. The hidden powers which manipulate it affects not only the workers, but also employers and governments.

The rifts which these powers seek to create are called deregulation, flexibility and unrestrained freedom of international trade. The Director-General is wisely concerned about Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

Fundamentally, though, there is only one value to be defended and protected because all the others stem from it, and that value is the human person who should be the principle, the subject and the end of all institutions.

The following statement by Pope Paul VI is in full harmony with one of the principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia "labour is not a commodity". This is precisely because man is not capital, not even as marxists say the most precious capital.

But what is man? The philosophical and theological definition of man is not something that we can dwell upon in this forum, but there are two scientific assertions on this subject which we should all consider.

Firstly, in genetic terms there is no difference of race or hierarchy between human beings. The second assertion is that each individual is unique.

Of the six billion people inhabiting our planet today, no two are absolutely identical, and forensic laboratories are experimenting on this statement which has never been disproved.

These two scientific assertions could form the basis and justification for universal morality. For the first assertion, the abolition of apartheid in South Africa is a tangible success to which the ILO contributed decisively. Pax Christi indeed would like to welcome the happy return of South Africa into the community of nations. As regards the second assertion, any supposedly rational solution which sacrifices any one person against his or her will, and, a fortiori, a group or an entire category of the population for the supposedly greater good would be rendered unacceptable.

Thus flagrantly contradicting the ethics, humanism or profound spirituality of the major religious currents, certain financial institutions or intergovernmental bodies in the world economy can, through their political and macroeconomic decisions, inadvertently cause crimes against humanity. Economic science and commercial mechanisms cannot be independent of ethics without infringing upon human rights.

As to the changes to be made, it is through a change in mentality that a project for the ILO and all international institutions could be drawn up, opening the path towards social justice in an ever-globalizing economy. Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Secretary-General of the United Nations stated at this rostrum, and I quote, "today we have the task of reinventing a new mode of life in our societies".

To illustrate this situation, I would like to recall some reflections, all of which are taken from a single paragraph of the encyclical Quadragesimo Anno of 15 May 1931. They are all strikingly topical today. I quote, "free competition has destroyed itself; freedom of the market has been supplanted by economic dictatorship; economic existence has become horribly harsh, implacable and cruel". Pius XI then denounced, and I quote, "unfortunate confounding of political and economic powers". The authorities, he says, have fallen to the rank of slave and have become the docile instrument of passions and ambitions of vested interests. Pius XI ends this premonitory paragraph with the lines, "in international relationships there are two different streams from the same source – on the one hand, economic nationalism or even imperialism; on the other hand, the internationalism or imperialism of money which is just as deadly and here, wherever the advantage is to be ascertained, that is where the loyalties lie".

Would Pius XI put it differently today?

Tripartism is in danger at the ILO because the three groups are in danger. They run the risk in the difficult and often dramatic situation experienced today by workers, of clashing all the more violently because the governments and the true employers, those connected to their enterprises, are increasingly losing their autonomy dominated as they are by the imperialism of money. Without producing anything, money – depending on the interests controlling it – can maintain or destabilize governments, push employers to bankruptcy and force competition between over-exploited workers and workers who have managed to obtain working conditions that hold human dignity in greater esteem.

Much has been said during these discussions about the social clause. This is a leitmotif in the Director-General's Report, and most speakers have stressed its importance. As to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, he has invited us to reflect upon and promote new development for our planet and to define together a new global social pact.

This will be the major concern of the World Summit for Social Development to be held in March 1995 in Copenhagen. This could result in a non-binding declaration which would be one of so many non-binding declarations referred to over the years in endless speeches and which have no effect on human rights. We need more than this. Protectionism is unacceptable, but unfair competition can result only in social regression and an extension of the recession.

The liberalization of world trade cannot be accepted without restraints. Free competition has to be subjected to just and reasonable limits; nor can we ignore the requirements of the institutions of the United Nations system. Mr. Boutros-Ghali rightly stressed the environmental factor. As regards the ILO it would seem to us that there are two categories of standards that have to be imposed unconditionally: they are those related to forced labour, including that of children, and freedom of association. Slavery, is a matter that does not need to be discussed – it is something that this has to be eradicated; and, if there is no freedom of association, the situation is often the same as that with forced labour. Competition may act as an incentive, but it has to be exercised in conformity with the fundamental principles of the ILO Constitution and, in particular, the Declaration of Philadelphia. We would like to pay hommage to the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Mr. MAIBAWA (Minister for Labour and Employment, Papua New Guinea) – It is indeed with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to this post at this important session of the International Labour Conference – a session which is most important in the sense that this year we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO. Under his able leadership, I am confident that through its many deliberations the Conference will reach many conclusions of great value and benefit to the workers, employers and governments of the world. I also take this opportunity to congratulate the Director-General and his hard-working staff for the Report entitled Defending values, promoting change. I also congratulate the Governing Body for its continuing excellent supervision of the International Labour Organization.

At the advent of a new world economic order, my country, Papua New Guinea, undoubtedly appreciates the current emphasis given by the Governing Body and reflected in the reports. Everybody must agree that we should now seriously consider ways and means of planning for a better tomorrow.

I agree that following the dramatic changes in recent times, particularly after the disappearance of a substantial portion of the communist bloc and the ensuing liberalization in favour of the free play of market forces in an increasingly global economy, our international labour community must be able to stand up and be counted as the whole world searches for a new world economic order. It is in the background of a changing world order that we must all critically review our past performances and achievements with a view to making the ILO more relevant as an essential agent of change. My country, although young, developing and endowed with many rich mineral and natural resources, also has experienced its share of problems created by our changing world today. Our unemployment rate is high in comparison with the rest of the world as a result of the recent downturn in the world economy and its effect on our agricultural export commodities. Improvements are, however, now slowly being experienced and our country shall soon regain sufficient momentum to begin creating jobs in a sufficient number again.

Despite the weaknesses in some aspects of our national economic life, our overall national economy performed quite well over the last three years. It registered GDP growth rates ranging from 9.5 per cent in 1991 to 14.4 per cent in 1993 as a result of strong performances in our production and export of gold, copper, oil and forest products. My country highly values tripartism and benefits from an active partnership policy. It also accepts and believes that the promotion of social justice in the field of labour can be achieved only if the social partners themselves are involved together in the search for mutually acceptable solutions to our labour and related problems.

The need to create jobs in sufficient numbers in order to deal effectively with our unemployment problem today constitutes a top priority of my Government, which recognizes the values of continuing collaboration with the ILO in the fields of employment and unemployment. In this light we note with particular interest the Governing Body's proposal to change the ILO's name to that of the International Organization for Employment and Labour, in the hope and anticipation of giving the ILO much needed appropriateness and relevance to today's needs and problems.

My Government supports the proposal because we strongly believe the role of the ILO in our changing world must be broadened sufficiently to cater more for the interests of increasing unemployed portions of national labour forces throughout the world, while at the same time balancing these out with traditional roles of catering to and improving working conditions.

Our efforts from now on must serve both the employed and the unemployed of our national labour forces. The overall aim of the exercise is to identify clearly, facilitate and deal effectively with the interests of the two main components of our national labour forces, including both unemployed people who are actively looking for jobs and those who are currently employed.

As regards the restructuring of ILO activities introduced last year, and particularly in relation to the establishment of regional multidisciplinary teams, I am happy to report that representatives of my country have met several times with your team based in Manila. Under discussion are several technical assistance programmes which are soon to be finalized and implemented. The team played an active role in a recently convened national employment summit, whose recommendations are soon to be released for consideration by my Government.

On behalf of my Government and the people of Papua New Guinea, I take this opportunity to congratulate the International Labour Organization on its 75th anniversary which is being celebrated this year. I was delayed in attending this Conference as I had to remain in my country to lead and take part in our own national celebrations of this anniversary.

In order to celebrate, my Government declared Friday, 10 July 1994 a public holiday, thus allowing the Government, the employers, the workers and all our people to celebrate this 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization. This public holiday was also declared to pay tribute, acknowledge and recognize the key role of labour and the workers of our country in our national development. Through the public holiday my Government had the desire to show its appreciation openly for the role and influence of the ILO as an agency of the United Nations in our national development.

Our country joined the ILO on 1 May 1976 and since then it has seen fit to ratify a total of 19 ILO Conventions relating to basic human rights, human resource development, industrial relations, social security and general terms and conditions of employment. Since we became members my country has continued to fulfil its obligations by sending a national tripartite delegation to annual sessions of the Conference. We have also benefited through our membership from ILO technical cooperation, standard setting, research and information dissemination programmes.

Last, but not least, I wish this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, including its various committees all meeting simultaneously, success and fruitfulness in its various deliberations.

Mr. SIBANDA (Workers' delegate, Zimbabwe) – I would like to take this opportunity to join the previous speakers and congratulate the President on his election and those of the Vice-Presidents to chair this very important session of the Conference.

As we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia this year, the fundamental principles are still that lasting peace can be based only on social justice through the improvement of the workers' conditions. Among the areas of responsibilities are full employment, the regulation of working hours, raising standards of living, the provision of minimum living wages to all workers, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, and the right to collective bargaining, and the prohibition of child labour.

There can be no ambiguity about this mandate. It requires the ILO to promote the rights, interests and conditions of working people in all countries.

The way forward must be through the renewal of this fundamental commitment and the common search for the most effective ways of realizing the goals set out in 1919 and in 1944. International labour standards must be at the centre of these efforts.

In Africa today the democratic process has been slowed down, with working people having to swallow the bitter pill of structural adjustment which is in line with the neo-liberal policies of the World Bank and the IMF.

Under conditions of increasing international competition, the choice of a strategy based on low labour costs, associated with labour market deregulation and the renewal of employment protection, is neither acceptable nor feasible. Labour is not a commodity, and the market left to itself is incapable of generating economically efficient and socially just outcomes.

In this light, international labour standards are not only compatible with employment creation, they are necessary sign-posts for economic and social development. There is a need for government policies and tripartite cooperation in the creation of an overall environment in which enterprises can develop, employment can grow, living standards and working conditions can improve, and basic trade union rights can be protected within a constructive industrial relations system. International labour standards are indispensable in the creation of that environment.

Africa today faces a new phase in its development. Poverty is worsening throughout much of the continent. In most African countries, more than 50 per cent of the population is illiterate. The 3.2 per cent population growth rate in Africa is the highest ever experienced at any time in history. Women are particularly vulnerable and often have to carry out the heaviest work as men leave for towns in search of jobs. The economic and social situation of women in Africa was already disastrous before this present crisis. Many women are casual and temporary workers at the bottom of the occupational structure or are unpaid family workers. The pressure of structural adjustment has added burdens to women as they strive to provide for their families with reduced time and money, causing some to collapse while others hang on at the limits of their capabilities.

The African region registered negative economic growth in 1993, while in other regions the growth of the GDP was positive. The African economic and social crisis has not been met by an adequate response from the industrialized countries. While part of the debt has been written off, it has been done in a piecemeal fashion and has not stopped the total burden from continuing to rise.

The structural adjustment programmes of the World Bank and the IMF have led to worsening inequity and poverty and most often have failed to promote economic growth.

As I have stated above, the democratization process in Africa has slowed down recently. It is vital that the process be reinvigorated and given real meaning at all levels. Sustainable development requires open, democratic and accountable societies where human and trade union rights are fully respected. Economic development cannot be achieved on the basis of the repression of workers' rights. Respect of trade union rights is central to successful development because strong, independent and free trade union organizations promote an equitable redistribution of income and wealth.

The rapid increase in the level of the international exchange of goods, services and capital has reintroduced the link between employment and social costs. To reduce these costs, that is, wages and working conditions in order to bring down prices, particularly of exports, is unacceptable. The workers in Africa believe that effective international legislation to bring about a generalized improvement in social conditions should include a social clause in trade agreements with appropriate built-in mechanisms to prevent protectionism.

Tripartite involvement in the drawing up of national recovery and development programmes is a prerequisite for their success. Development can only succeed on the basis of a consensus, equity and a strong social dimension. Governments must insist in dealings with the IMF and the World Bank that a basic-needs approach be taken into account in all structural adjustment programmes.

Economic development programmes need to have a framework of stability which can allow economies to adjust successfully through increasing production and employment, rather than through economic contraction to cut imports. There must be a fair sharing of costs and sacrifices of adjustment and the highest contribution must be made by those with the greatest ability to pay.

If sacrifices can be set at the highest governmental level, then trade union movements could enter into "solidarity pacts" with the social partners to cover the development of the national economy.

Training, the retraining of adults and education are the key to economic development. African economies will never develop without spending more on education.

Naturally, where people are educated they will see the need for smaller and more manageable families, and this would lead to a reduction in the population growth. A reduction in population growth would bring immediate benefits in terms of less strain on health and education facilities and family incomes, and in the long term would reduce the rate of growth of the labour force. Developing countries need to balance the ratio of population growth to that of economic growth if they are to address the issue of unemployment, and I personally think this is vitally important if the African economies are to respond positively to structural adjustment formulas.

In conclusion, it is my considered view that all countries, employers' and workers' organizations have a common interest in the harmonious development of people and respect for social justice, and this can only be achieved by putting in place an anti-protectionist social clause based on the proscription of the violation of basic labour rights which could contribute to ensuring that international competition is based on raising productivity and not the exploitation of some of the world's most vulnerable workers.

Mr. MAITLAND (Workers' delegate, Australia) – The Australian trade union movement welcomes the opportunity to participate in the formulation of a new long-term agenda for the ILO.

The ILO has much to be proud of in its illustrious 75 years. However, we as member nations of the ILO face great challenges in continuing to promote the good work of the ILO. Issues such as the dissolution of the communist bloc and the increasing globalization of the world economy must be considered by this Organization.

One of the most important issues confronting the Conference is the continuing evolution of the world of work. Changes in technology and the impact on employment levels and working conditions are of great concern to workers and their unions around the world. Simultaneously, we find that management practices are continually evolving and this has enormous policy implications for the ILO.

The theme of social justice in a global economy has been adopted for this Conference. Nowadays, the challenges facing member nations in this area are of such magnitude that it seems that "social justice" and "global economy" are concepts which cannot possibly co-exist. In most developed nations today, the inequality between the wealthy and the working class is substantial. Some of the measures adopted by governments in the name of fiscal prudence, such as reductions in expenditure on health, education and social security, have exacerbated the problem.

Working people continue to be denied basic freedoms in all parts of the world. In some countries trade unionists carry on their activities under constant threat of assassination, imprisonment and even torture.

The world in which the ILO operates today is far different to the world of 1919. This is why it is vital that this Conference develops an agenda and a structure which is able to accommodate our complex world and all the challenges that it poses for the advancement of social justice.

The ILO was established in 1919, its objectives being to protect workers' rights, promote social and economic justice and develop an international labour code. The Organization has achieved much in terms of these objectives. There now exists a substantial international labour code, encompassing Conventions and Recommendations on topics such as hours of work, freedom of association, the right to organize, collective bargaining, equal pay, health and safety, and wages protection.

However, this international labour code has been adopted by member States in a patchy way. Many nations have failed to ratify or indeed enforce ILO Conventions and Recommendations. There is also the danger that as governments deregulate their labour markets and seek to move their economies into the international marketplace, the domestic political agenda will become increasingly hostile to workers' and trade union rights. Government compliance with ILO standards then becomes less feasible.

The ILO should continue the process of reviewing standards to ensure that they remain relevant. It may even be worthwhile to review recent Conventions which have not been as widely ratified as expected due to their perceived rigidity and onerous requirements.

In our continuing efforts to combat the exploitation of working people, the ILO must confront a vast number of policy areas. These include environmental policy, and trade policy and practices.

Above all, we must acknowledge that the dignity of people is based fundamentally on the right to employment. Poverty, unemployment and underemployment affect all our nations to differing degrees and no nation can solve such problems alone due to the globalization of the international economy. The ILO, as an international organization of significant standing, must play an important role in this regard. We cannot leave the management of the international economic situation to bodies such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The ILO must ensure that social progress develops simultaneously with economic growth. In this regard, there is certainly scope for much greater cooperation between the IMF, the World Bank, GATT and the ILO.

As the ILO continues to determine standards for working people around the world, we need to be sure that these standards are consistent if we are to promote economic growth, and justice and equity in all nations. What this means is that the ILO standards must be able to influence the policy agenda in all member nations, from developing nations to the more advanced economies.

Given the wide range of issues in which the ILO must seek to involve itself in the future, the Organization should seek the active input of the many and diverse non-governmental organizations promoting social justice goals.

The ILO has traditionally been an organization of persuasion and encouragement rather than of coercion. The Australian trade union movement believes that this should continue as the underlying philosophy of the ILO.

There do exist avenues, however, for the ILO to strengthen its supervisory role in areas such as forced labour, child labour, discrimination in employment and so on. The International Labour Office could offer a voluntary mediation and arbitration service and thereby monitor developments in these areas.

I have already highlighted the increasing globalization of the world economy and the special challenges it poses to the ILO. The insertion of social clauses in international trade agreements may provide a mechanism for ILO participation in safeguarding ILO standards in signatory nations. Ideally, signatory nations to a trade agreement should assess the nature of the agreement through their own domestic tripartite arrangements. To offset some of the burden involved in developing nations improving their labour and social conditions, international trade agreements may provide a mechanism through which industrialized nations can offer some sort of compensatory assistance to these developing nations. There is scope for involvement of the ILO in such initiatives. The Organisation must seek to promote social justice not only within nations but also between them.

The ILO has traditionally had an important function in giving practical support to constituent nations in areas such as information on and analysis of issues of employment and industrial relations. It also acts as a forum for debate amongst member nations on these issues, as well as providing technical support in the development of labour legislation, social security systems and so on. Of course, the demand for such services has increased greatly since 1919. It is essential then that the ILO's research function continues to provide a fundamental underpinning to the Organization's activities, including the development of the labour code.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO provides us, as member nations, with the opportunity to fundamentally review and where necessary improve the structure and activities of the ILO. The challenges facing the ILO are enormous but they must be met if the Organization is to consolidate its standing in the international community. I urge you all to take up these challenges.

Mr. TOTH (representative, Trade Unions International of Transport Workers) – The 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, which coincides with the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization, is being held at a crucial juncture of history which witnesses many epoch-making events taking place in the world.

On behalf of the Trade Unions International of Transport Workers, we express our heart-felt greetings to the delegates and feel happy to join with them to celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

The failure of socialism in the ex-Soviet Union and Eastern European countries has been marked by a change in the balance of power in the world. The new situation has emboldened the forces of international capital to establish a world economic order directed towards securing higher and higher rates of profit at the cost of working people. Neo-liberal economic theories are propounded with great enthusiasm, and levers of economic power are being used to influence the policies of governments of countries to ignore the social issues.

Despite the end of the Cold War and the alleged victory over socialism, the world is experiencing a longer period of recession. In the industrial world, 35 million workers are unemployed; and more than 800 million workers in the developing countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America are without any job. Indescribable poverty and want further degrade the lives of millions of people all over the world. Life in the countries of transition economies is becoming more and more hard.

Transport workers all over the world are the special victims of the neo-liberal policy of restructuring, privatization and deregulation. Railways, ports and docks, and civil aviation, which are generally held in public ownership, are being handed over to the private sector. The concept of public service obligation in the railways, and in the publicly-held passenger bus services is being thrown out. Theories are being floated that the State needs to be the infrastructure provider.

Hundreds of thousands of transport workers are the victims of retrenchment and have been made redundant, and many in Latin America, Asia and Europe are being forced into premature retirement.

The jobs, working conditions, social security and trade union rights of transport workers are under serious attack all over the world.

Despite many handicaps, the ILO has, over the years, scored some remarkable successes in setting forth labour standards with the goal of achieving social justice and progress. ILO Conventions it proved possible to adopt at the tripartite level are no gifts to the world labour. Labour has had to earn the progress in international labour legislation through countless heroic struggles and actions. Further success in the ratification and implementation of labour standards is not an automatic process. It has to be fought and won. Many basic ILO Conventions, particularly those relating to trade union and basic human rights, have not yet been ratified and implemented by many countries whose delegates can be found present here to celebrate the 75th anniversary. There is now a concerted attempt to belittle the importance of the ILO's role as the labour standard setter. Some are even loud in saying that labour standards are hindrances to development. We are opposed to the dilution of the standard-setting role of the ILO. Rather, we consider that the ILO needs to enhance the effectiveness of its role in ensuring compliance in a higher number of ratifications of basic standards and in their implementation. It also needs to address the question of the social dimension arising out of restructurings and the introduction of new technology into industry.

The world today is in the grip of a heated debate on the issue of establishing a linkage between international labour standards and international trade. The G7 countries are vociferous for the establishment of such a linkage. On the other hand, developing countries of the world are opposed to such a linkage being incorporated into the GATT agreement. The Trade Unions International of Transport Workers stands for upliftment, social justice and progress for the workers of developing countries; and all countries, developed or developing, must take action to deal with genuine social and environmental questions.

Social progress and justice cannot be achieved by mechanical and forced means. The ILO should not be used for purposes other than those related to social justice, progress and human rights; it should not be used for the interests of big business.

Trade Unions International of Transport Workers will continue to support all ILO activities directed towards the welfare of workers the world over.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.15 p.m.)

Credentials

Fourth report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. The number of delegates and advisers who have registered at the Conference at this time and who are still present is contained in the annex to this report.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Romania

2. The Committee had before it an objection to the Employers' delegation of Romania, which had been submitted by the National Union of Romanian Employers (UNPR), under the signature of its President, Mr. Stefan Chelariu, who was also an adviser and substitute to the Employers' delegate of Romania.

3. The objecting organization protested against the inclusion in the delegation of the Employers' delegate and three of his advisers, who all belonged to the National Confederation of Romanian Employers (CNPR), on the grounds that they were not truly representative of the Employers of Romania. The objecting organization added that the Government had not paid the travel and subsistence expenses of the four members of the Employers' delegation who belonged to the UNPR.

4. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, signed on behalf of Mr. Dan Mircea Popescu, Minister of Labour and Social Protection, Head of the delegation to the Conference, the Government explained that the CNPR and the UNPR were the two legally constituted representative Employers' organizations in Romania and had both been consulted on the nomination of the Employers' delegation. It gave details concerning the Employers' organizations affiliated to each of them as well as the number of members of those organizations in so far as the CNPR was concerned. The UNPR had not provided the necessary data. It stated that the Employers' organizations belonging to the CNPR held 95 percent of the country's wealth (in the public and private sectors) and provided 90 percent of its GDP. The Government added that, because of the financial situation, it had been possible to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of only three representatives of the most representative organization in each of the non-governmental delegations.

5. Since the President of the objecting organization was serving as adviser to the Employers' delegate, in accordance with Article 26, paragraph 4(c) of the Conference Standing Orders the Committee declared the objection not to be receivable in so far as it concerned the Employers' delegate.

6. The Committee considered the objection to the nomination of the Employers' advisers to be unfounded, as in the absence of any evidence that the CNPR was less representative of Employers in Romania than the objecting organization, the Committee could only conclude that the nomination of advisers belonging to the CNPR in addition to advisers belonging to the UNPR had been made in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution.

7. With regard to the question of travel and subsistence expenses, the Committee noted that, in the credentials issued by the Government, the President of the UNPR was placed second on the list of advisers to the Employers' delegate. In such circumstances, the Committee considered that it would be normal to have included him among the three members of the Employers' delegation whose expenses the Government was in a position to cover.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Panama

8. The Committee examined an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Panama submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

9. The ICFTU maintained that although the "Confederación de Trabajadores de la República de Panamá (CTRP)" was clearly the most representative organization in the country according to official statistics provided, it had not been invited to participate in the meeting of the "Consejo Nacional de Trabajadores Organizados (CONATO)", which was responsible for the selection of organizations that designated the Workers' delegate to the Conference. CONATO was in any event not a body freely set up by trade unions, but rather a coordinating body established by law and whose function was regulated by the executive. The procedure used for the appointment was discriminatory and not in conformity with Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution.

10. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Gregorio Ordoñez, Minister of Labour and Social Welfare and Head of the delegation to the Conference, indicated that the Government had acted in accordance with the Constitution and legal provisions in force. In this regard, in accordance with Article 1066 of the Labour Code, CONATO was a consultative body made up of Workers' confederations, centres and non-affiliated federations, whose function was to recommend to the Government the names of three persons to represent the workers of Panama in congresses, international conferences and national bodies. Based on that provision, in consulting CONATO, the Government had complied with Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution. The Government referred to the statement of the Credentials Committee of the 46th session of the Conference (1962), according to which the determination of the most representative organization is a question of fact to be decided at the time when a particular nomination had to be made. CONATO had precisely that function and had nominated the CTRP in 1992 by the same method as that followed this year to nominate the representative of another organization. Consultation should not be confused with selection, which the Government did on the basis of the three names proposed by CONATO.

11. The Committee also heard the Minister, who was accompanied by members of the Government delegation. In addition to the information provided in his written reply, the Minister told the Committee that the CTRP had informed him subsequent to the submission of the three names and the selection by the Government of the delegate, that it had not participated in the meeting at which CONATO had made the proposals and that he did not know the reasons for the non-participation. While recognizing that the CTRP had the largest membership, he considered that representativity was a matter for CONATO to determine, that the recommendations of CONATO were made in accordance with its own criteria and any disagreement was for CONATO and not the Government to resolve. The CTRP had, in the past, been the organization most often represented at the Conference.

12. The Committee noted that the system for the nomination of the Workers' delegate which consisted in the Government selecting the delegate from a list of three names proposed to it by CONATO had been used in the past without any objections being filed. However, in following the procedures for nomination established under its national law, the Government had to make sure that Panama's international obligations were satisfied. Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution required that the Workers' delegate be appointed in agreement with the most representative Workers' organizations in the country. This year, the Government had been informed by the CTRP, which appeared to be the most representative Workers' organization in Panama, that it had not been consulted in the nomination of the Workers' delegate. Whatever the intrinsic merits of the procedure followed – and reservations were expressed by Committee members on a number of aspects and particularly on the requirement that three names must be proposed by CONATO – the Committee considered that it could be acceptable from the point of view of Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution only in so far as it secured the greatest possible agreement among the most representative Workers' organizations in Panama. The procedure had failed to do so in the present case and thus fell short of the Government's international obligations. In view of the fact that the system used for the selection of the Workers' delegate was being contested for the first time, the Committee decided however not to act on the objection, expressing the hope that the Government would take the necessary action to ensure that, whatever mechanisms under national law were used, Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution was complied with.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Japan

13. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Japan submitted by the National Confederation of Trade Unions (Zenroren) and supported by the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU).

14. The objecting organization maintained that the Government of Japan had arbitrarily nominated the Workers' delegate and advisers from a list recommended by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (Rengo). Whereas, in past years, there had been unofficial conversations with Zenroren on the subject of the nomination, this year Zenroren was not consulted at all. The only reason given by the Government for its nomination was that it had failed to obtain Rengo's consent. Zenroren was founded on the same day as Rengo, was composed of 27 national industrial unions and 46 prefectural organizations, had a membership of more than 1.4 million and in a government report was treated, together with Rengo, as one of the "major organizations". Quoting the statement of the Credentials Committee of the International Labour Conference in 1962 concerning the need for governments to undertake genuine consultations to reach an agreement with the most representative organizations, the objecting organization claimed that the choice of the Workers' delegation violated Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution.

15. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Sakutaro Takahashi, Assistant Minister for Labour and Government delegate to the Conference, indicated that the Government had consulted Rengo which is the industrial organization which is the most representative workers' organization in the country. According to the 1993 Basic Survey on Trade Unions, Rengo had a total membership of 7,819,054 consisting of 72 affiliated organizations, Zenroren had 855,882 members composed of 23 affiliated organizations and Zenrokyo had 299,920 members consisting of four affiliated organizations. Compared with the 1991 figures, Rengo had increased its membership by 203,606 while the figures for Zenroren (a total of 840,237 members in 1991) had remained roughly the same. Concerning the nomination procedure, the Government had received a letter from Rengo on 22 April recommending the names of its representatives as Workers' delegate and advisers to the 81st session of the Conference, while on 21 April it had received a request in writing from Zenroren to be included in the Workers' delegation. On receiving Zenroren's request, the Government immediately informed Rengo and held consultations with it on 25, 27 and 28 April and on 10 May. Following consultations on 10 May, Rengo indicated that the inclusion of Zenroren would be unacceptable to it. The Government therefore decided on 13 May, in agreement with Rengo, to nominate the persons recommended by Rengo and informed Zenroren of its decision that same day. The Government held consultations with Zenroren following the latter's request on 16 and 17 May and with Rengo on 18 and 24 May. The Government had dealt with the case with sincerity and had consulted Rengo repeatedly. It was ready to make further efforts in that regard. As long as there was a difference of opinion between Rengo and Zenroren, the only way of fulfilling its obligations under the ILO Constitution was to nominate the Workers' delegate and advisers in line with the views of Rengo.

16. The Committee considered that, according to the statistical data provided, Rengo continued by far to be the most representative Workers' organization in Japan. Despite the discrepancy in the figures provided concerning the membership of Zenroren, it noted that the Government listed Zenroren as the second organization in order of size in the country. The Committee also noted the various efforts made by the Government to get Rengo's agreement on the request by Zenroren, but that the consultations with Zenroren had taken place only after the Government's decision had been taken on the nomination. Since the basic requirements of Article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution had been satisfied, the Committee did not uphold the objection. However, it stressed the desirability of the Workers' delegation as a whole being fully representative of the Workers of Japan. It welcomed the Government's willingness to make further efforts, and expressed the hope that those efforts would lead to full agreement on the nomination of the Workers' delegate and advisers.

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Swaziland

17. The Committee had before it objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Swaziland submitted by the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU), the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU), the Southern African Trade Unions Coordination Council (SATUCC) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

18. The objecting organizations maintained that the SFTU was the most representative Workers' organization in Swaziland and gave statistics indicating that it represented over 43,000 workers organized in 13 unions. Agreement on the nomination of the Workers' delegate had been reached between the Government and one organization only, the Swaziland Federation of Labour (SFL), which – according to figures that it had itself supplied – represented only 4,500 workers organized in six unions. Since it had broken away from the SFTU in 1992, the SFL had supported government and employer interests. According to the objection lodged by the ICFTU, the Government attempted at a late stage to arrange for consultations between the SFL and the SFTU, but when it was clear that useful consultations were not possible, it reverted to its original intention to appoint the delegate in agreement with the minority SFL. For the above reasons, the objecting organizations requested invalidation of the credentials.

19. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. A.H.N. Shabangu, Minister of Labour and Public Service indicated that in his country, there are two federations, the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions and the Swaziland Federation of Labour. Both organizations had submitted the names of their affiliates to the Government, but it noted that a number of unions were affiliated to both organizations. Taking into account the Industrial Relations Act of 1980 which obliged the unions to represent all workers, whether they are members or not, both federations were equally important. Both federations were consulted on 6 May 1994, but they could not agree on the representative and left the matter in the hands of the Government. The Government decided that both federations should attend the ILO Conferences on an alternating basis until clarification of the number of their affiliates.

20. The Committee noted that the Government did not dispute the statement of the objecting organizations that the SWFTU was more representative than the SFL despite the indication given that a number of unions were affiliated to both federations. It considered that the criteria referred to by the Government, which led to its conclusion that the two federations were both equally important, did not address the question of representativity of the organizations. The Committee however noted that the Government had consulted both federations on 6 May concerning the nomination but that no agreement had been reached. Concerning the decision taken by the Government to appoint the delegate on the basis of a system of rotation, the Committee recalled that such a system cannot be a criterion for the application of Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution but only a method to obtain the agreement of the most representative organizations themselves on the composition of the Workers' delegation to the Conference, and that it should under no circumstances be imposed by the Government. Since no agreement had been secured, it would have been advisable for the Government, for the purpose of complying with its obligations under Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, to have proceeded to nominate the Workers' delegate from the organization which had been recognized to be the most representative in previous years.

21. In view of the foregoing, the Committee expressed serious doubts as to whether the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Swaziland had been made in conformity with Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, but decided not to propose invalidation this year. In taking this decision, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would in the future provide reliable data so as to enable the assessment by the Committee of the representative character of the organizations, that it would scrupulously comply with the obligations of Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution and in particular, ensure that the nomination of the Workers' delegate would be made in agreement with the most representative organizations.

Payment of travel and subsistence expenses of delegations

22. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' Group, signed by its Secretary, Mr. Costas Kapartis, wishing to register the protest of the Employers' Group at the number of governments which had not respected their obligation under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution to bear travel and subsistence expenses for their Employers' delegations. Fourteen Employer delegations had informed the Group of the failure of their Government to provide them with any financial support. Thirty-one delegations had not had their travelling and subsistence expenses totally paid. Many others had not been able to participate at the Conference for lack of financial support.

23. The Group also expressed its dissatisfaction with the continuing imbalance between Governments and Employers' and Workers' advisers which was mainly detrimental to the Employers. The communication added that, as the Employers' Group had stated during the past years, this problem took dimensions beyond the non-fulfilment of the constitutional obligation that member States undertook. It interfered with tripartism, the correct composition of delegations and the smooth functioning of the Conference.

24. The Committee drew attention to paragraph 16 of its First Report, Provisional Record No. 8, page 8/2 which recalled the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers, and trusted that this obligation would be respected throughout the duration of the Conference.

25. At the same time, the Committee once again recalled the provisions in the Conference Standing Orders that set out its mandate, namely Article 5 and 26, which did not include in its functions the consideration of objections based on non-compliance by a member State with its obligations under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the ILO Constitution. The Committee's action was therefore limited to taking note of the communications received.

26. The Committee recalled that the Credentials Committee of the 79th Session of the Conference in its Fourth Report had requested consideration of the possibility of introducing an appropriate mechanism to evaluate the extent to which the obligation under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution was being complied with (79th Session, Provisional Record, No. 26, page 26/5). The Committee was informed that the Office now highlighted the call made to that effect in the Memorandum for the Conference and included a space on that subject in the Form for Credentials which was sent to governments along with the Memorandum. This year, the Governments of 54 member States had responded to this initiative when they issued the credentials of their delegations. Forty of those Governments had declared that they paid the expenses of the whole of their delegations, and 14 had said that they only covered part of the expenses of their delegations.

27. In taking note of the Office's initiative, the Committee recognized that since no response had been received from 104 of the member States, it was not possible at the present time to assess the extent to which the obligation under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution was being complied with. It hoped that in future all member States would provide the necessary information.

Other Communications

28. The Committee received communications from the Government of Myanmar, the "Union syndicale des Comores" and the Free Trade Union Confederation of Cap Verde. The Committee considered that none of these communications called for any action on its part.

29. This report was adopted by the Credentials Committee unanimously and is therefore submitted to the Conference in order that it may take note of it.

Sixth item on the agenda: The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets

Report of the Committe on Private Employment Agencies

1. The Committee on Private Employment Agencies, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 8 June 1994, consisted of 184 members (76 Government members, 61 Employers' members, 47 Workers' members). It also included 13 Government deputy members, 24 Employers' deputy members and 54 Workers' deputy members.[1] In addition, 20 non-governmental international organizations were represented.[2]

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mrs. A.O. Okoronkwo (Government member, Nigeria) at its first sitting.

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Göran Hultin (Employers' member, Finland) and Mr. Leon Lynch (Workers' member, United States), both at its first sitting.

Reporter: Mr. Anders Kruse (Government member, Sweden) at its eighth sitting.

3. At its tenth sitting, the Committee appointed a Working Party to draw up a draft resolution and conclusions based on views expressed during the plenary discussions, for consideration by the Committee. The Working Party was composed as follows: six Government members: Mr. Pratt (Australia), Ms. Nixon (Canada), Mr. Babu (India), Mr. Otieno (Kenya), Ms. Mozdzenska-Mrozek (Poland), Mr. Kruse (Sweden); six Employers' members: Mr. Hultin (Finland), Mr. Akoulou-Eyeleko (Gabon), Mr. Matsui (Japan), Mr. Magnussen (Norway), Mr. Biller (United States), Mr. Guevara (Venezuela); six Workers' members: Mr. Bacon (Australia), Ms. Ska (Belgium), Mr. Gary Sanchez (Chile), Mr. Dergel (Sweden), Mr. Mpangala (United Republic of Tanzania), Mr. Lynch (United States).

5. The Committee had before it Report VI, The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, prepared by the Office as the sixth item of the agenda of the Conference.

Introduction

6. The representative of the Secretary-General welcomed the members of the Committee as well as the observers present and congratulated the Chairperson and the Vice-Chairmen on their election. He stressed the importance of good relations between members of the Committee, between the Committee and the secretariat, and pledged to make every effort possible to ensure that such relations were maintained.

7. In introducing the report, The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets, the representative of the Secretary-General emphasized that the Office had persisted in pursuing the issue over the years when all attempts to place the item under consideration on the agenda on the International Labour Conference had failed. The Office perceived the need to examine the question since it was of considerable and increasing importance to labour markets and their functioning, as well as to examine the extent to which existing standards in this field were still able to provide adequate protection to workers in a rapidly changing environment. He pointed to the unusual opportunity which this discussion provided for a possible revision of existing standards on the subject.

8. With regard to the subject under consideration, the ILO had undertaken to monitor world labour market developments with a view to proposing, at an appropriate time, ways and means of adapting its approaches and possibly even its standards to new realities, while ensuring adequate protection for workers without impeding economic efficiency. The Governing Body's decision to place this item on the agenda of the Conference responded to developments in labour market management. This justified a fresh look at ILO approaches and principles and raised the question of whether the ILO could or should take further measures to encourage improvements in the functioning of labour markets.

9. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the report was the fruit of many months of research, discussion, study and assessment of all issues involved. He thanked all governments, workers' and employers' organizations, professional and academic institutions and individuals who had assisted in this process. He stressed that the sole purpose of the report was to provide a solid factual and intellectual basis for the discussions of the Committee and to assist it to reach its own conclusions concerning possible future action. He was convinced that the subject under consideration would provide the Committee with a good opportunity to display real tripartism in action, which made the ILO unique in its approach. He expressed confidence that the conclusions reached by the Committee would enhance the international reputation of the ILO in the social and labour fields, and that it would be particularly appropriate on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of ILO as well as the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

General discussion

10. Speaking on behalf of the Employers' members, the Employers' Vice-Chairman said that he recognized the contribution made by public employment services in the functioning of labour markets particularly with regard to administration, the payment of unemployment benefits, the supplying of candidates for jobs and organizing training for the unemployed. Both employers and workers had benefited from these activities. However, in their view, the Committee should define the issues being discussed since, although the report covered the activities of present-day private employment agencies (PREA), consideration should also be given to those of the future and to both the current and future needs of employers and jobseekers.

11. According to the Employers' members, the complexity of the market and its evolution were reflected in the number and range of agencies and the innovative services presently being offered, particularly by the private sector. Regulations had not "outsmarted" the market; that proved that monopolies led to the emergence of shadow economies. Employers did not appreciate irregular practices, but felt that regulations to prohibit private agencies led to a lack of transparency.

12. The Employers' members considered that statistics did not provide a full measure of the impact of private agencies on employment. The data available gave solid indications of the contribution made by both public and private agencies in the placement of jobseekers. Even if the public and private sectors frequently catered to different needs and different groups of jobseekers, coexistence and even competition, appeared none the less to be desirable.

13. Speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, the Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that the purpose of the discussion was to explore the relevance of certain ILO Conventions and Recommendations, whether they should be revised, and whether there was need for new standards reflecting new realities in the area of temporary work. It was the desire of the Workers to adopt new standards in this area. The decision of the Governing Body of the ILO to hold this discussion had perhaps indicated a way out of the impasse which had prevented the Organization from tackling these issues for more than 20 years.

14. The Workers' Vice-Chairman added that this discussion also touched on two other controversial labour issues: employment and the job crisis. The recent report of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) on employment indicated that governments were taking seriously their obligation to maintain employment and ensure the functioning of the labour market. That contrasted with the slogans of the 1980s when it was thought that an unregulated market would take care of employment. Although free market ideas were popular with some governments, the public still held them accountable for employment and intervention in the labour market.

15. In the view of the Workers' members the nature of work was also called into question. The activities of private employment agencies raised questions about employment relationships which challenged traditional labour law. Workers were in danger of being redefined in ways that jeopardized the stability of society.

Employers too were being redefined — as evidenced by the new ways of conducting business which were reflected by the services provided by many private employment agencies. Therefore, the effect of private employment agencies especially temporary work agencies (TWAs) on industrial relations and collective bargaining should also be discussed. The regulation of private agencies and the limitations of self-regulation should be seriously considered. There was a need for greater transparency since "private" did not mean "secret".

16. Many Government, Employers' and Workers' members congratulated the Office on its comprehensive and thoroughly researched report, The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. Some Committee members, however, commented that the situation in developing countries had not been adequately covered.

17. Several Government members agreed that the rapid pace of change in labour market conditions and functioning made it necessary to reconsider the roles of both public and private employment agencies. The problem was not to choose between public and private employment agencies, but to make labour markets function better. They placed emphasis on the service approach, whereby more efficient and equitable services were required from public as well as private employment agencies. They considered that a model based on cooperation would be the most appropriate one, with competition among private agencies being an essential feature. Some Employers' members stressed the positive contribution of private employment agencies to labour market functioning, based on their adequate responses to market conditions.

18. Many Employers' and Government members made known their position on some of the more important issues by referring to the situation in their respective countries. The majority pointed out that most recruitment took place through direct contacts between jobseekers and employers. However, whenever the private sector was engaged in placement activities, the private and public sectors either operated in fair competition or provided complementary services, whatever the specific nature of their activities. Several Government members stated that their current legislation in no way impeded the operation of private employment agencies. Some had abolished most of the regulatory restrictions and denounced Convention No. 96 concerning Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Revised) (1949); others had never ratified it but had ratified Convention No. 88 concerning the Organization of the Employment Service (1948). These governments were committed to supporting the active coexistence of public and private employment services. Legislation, they said, should aim at supervising agencies through registration and protection of jobseekers. Private agencies should provide for the establishment of their own controlling body and professional organization.

19. One Government member explained that her country had not ratified Convention No. 96. While the growth of private agencies had been rapid, it was useful to make a distinction between profit-making and non-profit-making agencies. Public funds were made available to extend government services for specific groups. In the case of aboriginal people, delivery of employment services is being devolved to them.

20. Some Government members from countries which had laws restricting the operation of private agencies or imposing tight state supervision stated that they were in the process of adopting more liberal legislation. Some intended to treat certain categories of workers such as migrant workers and contract labourers in a different way. Others had ended the state monopoly when private agencies emerged to cater to the demands of large numbers of workers who wished to work abroad. In order to avoid malpractices in such cases, governments monitored the phenomenon by requiring the registration of agencies and protecting jobseekers. This market was in effect being jointly managed by the public and private sectors. This shared responsibility for the management of the labour market would be enshrined in new legislation.

21. Several Employers' members pointed to the positive aspects of work done by temporary work agencies which were subject to the same regulations as other employers. For example, they had been very successful in retraining and finding new jobs for workers laid off as a result of the recession. In some countries, collective agreements and regulations had been adopted following tripartite negotiations.

22. Several Government members explained that the fast growth and changes that had taken place in the economies of certain developing countries had created the need for private employment agencies which could react to changing requirements much faster than public services. The needs of new categories of jobseekers such as university graduates and also of new types of employers had to be met. In some cases existing legislation provided for the compulsory notification of vacancies to public labour exchanges and the protection of vulnerable groups such as migrant workers and contract labourers.

23. A number of Workers' and Government members stated that there were few or no private employment agencies in many developing countries. They had therefore little experience with private employment agencies but felt that the experiences of others in this area might be useful for the future. While some favoured the creation of private employment agencies, others stated that they would not like the development of private agencies to hamper the strengthening of the involvement of trade unions in collective bargaining. One Government member stressed that in the least developed countries, it was more important to promote the development of public employment services than to encourage the creation of private agencies. Some members cautioned that the appearance of private agencies in some developing countries might give workers expectations that could not be fulfilled since few jobs were being created. They also warned of potential abuses such as those which occurred in many small enterprises where the provisions of written contracts were often not being honoured.

24. The Workers' members stated that new types of jobs and employers were emerging, posing a challenge for industrial relations in general and collective bargaining in particular. The Employers' members held that workers could benefit from more effective employment services. Private employment agencies could provide such services if they were not over-regulated. Several Government members recognized that one of the principles on which labour market management should be based was to safeguard against exploitation while recognizing the importance of free and independent private employment agencies. In that respect, national standards applicable to both public and private employment agencies should be established.

25. The Committee agreed that any new standards should reaffirm one of the most important tenets of the Declaration of Philadelphia, namely, that "labour is not a commodity".

26. A number of Government and Workers' members stressed that a basic principle regarding employment services should be that no jobseeker should have to pay for finding a job.

27. Several Government and Workers' members pointed to the importance of access to adequate labour market information for improved labour market functioning. That would enhance the transparency of operations and benefit employers, jobseekers and government services. They also considered that placement and the matching of jobseekers with vacancies would remain a core function of employment agencies. Several members noted the need for taking into account the changing nature of work and the impact of technology, requiring flexible responses from both public and private employment agencies.

28. Several Employers' and Government members remarked on the limited contribution that employment agencies, in particular private agencies, had made to the development of labour markets in developing countries. However, that situation was changing due to liberalization, structural adjustment and economic growth. Developing countries had little experience with those agencies but they could learn much from the experiences of other countries through their participation in the work of the Committee. Labour market functioning in developing countries was often restricted by the few jobs being created. Self-employment was therefore the only realistic prospect for the majority of labour market entrants and as such, employment agencies should not raise undue expectations.

29. Several Government and Workers' members emphasized a more active role for employment agencies in order to improve labour market functioning and employment promotion. Several Employers' members stressed the contribution education and training services could make in this respect. Some Government members also mentioned the importance of providing assistance to small and medium-sized enterprises.

30. The Employers' members and a large majority of Government members favoured the revision of Convention No. 96 in such a way as to remove the concept of state monopoly in providing employment services.

31. Most members supported the concept of coexistence between public and private employment services. However, different opinions were expressed on the nature of the relationship which ought to exist. Some members stressed the idea of complementarity while others placed emphasis on the supervision and control which should be exercised by governments. In this regard, the role of governments in managing the supply of labour through the provision of education, training and retraining was also underlined.

32. Some members indicated that any revised standards should be flexible but at the same time provide adequate protection for jobseekers. These standards should recognize the role of all the actors involved in the labour market.

33. One Government member felt that Convention No. 88 should be discussed together with Convention No. 96. The revised standards should contain basic principles for the protection of workers, taking account of the need for flexibility and reflecting the situation in different countries. Another member favoured the adoption of a single standard to cover both the private and public sectors.

34. One Government member believed that Conventions Nos. 96 and 88 were outdated but that their revision should not be given the highest priority in the context of the rest of the work of the ILO. It was also possible that ILO guidance on these issues could be appropriately covered in non-mandatory form, such as a code of practice.

Assessment of the present situation

35. There was a large degree of agreement on the usefulness of the typology presented in the Report prepared by the Office. While the range of agencies described in Chapter 2 was not exhaustive, it was useful for discussions on the need for any future international standards on the subject.

36. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of his group, stressed the complexities of the market, as evidenced by the various types of agencies mentioned in the Report. This reflected the various and changing needs of enterprises and jobseekers. Agencies would therefore evolve to cater for any new needs with an even larger range of types of agencies appearing in the future.

37. Certain members of the Employers' group pointed out that the classification of agencies as contained in the Report was not fully accurate in some respects and did not correspond to the situation in their respective countries. Contract labour agencies were not placement agencies and TWAs were not contract labour agencies. Subcontracting was becoming more common as the economies of countries changed and enterprises sought greater efficiency.

38. The Workers' Vice-Chairman felt that almost all the types of agencies mentioned in the Report existed in some industrialized countries.

39. However, one Workers' member stated that some types of agencies had not been mentioned. In his country, some agencies employed a large number of people working at home, for instance, in cigarette making or garment manufacturing. Regular jobs were thus being "casualized" or transferred to the informal unorganized sector.

40. Another Workers' member regretted that the Report focused on workers who had a written contract. Many contracts were oral or could be subject to a collective agreement. He believed that the definitions had idealized the situations and described some problem cases. For example, migrant workers were frequently recruited, not because qualified local workers were not available, but because migrants were cheaper. Sometimes workers had difficulty in identifying their true employer or the labour laws which applied. TWAs involved unclear triangular relationships. He felt that head-hunters were only useful to employers and served no economic purpose to society as a whole. He noted that inaccurate figures cited to compare public employment agencies in Germany with private agencies in the United States, as contained in Report VI, distorted the actual cost-benefit ratio of monopolies and were misleading.

41. A Government member noted that although the classification of agencies was correct, there were difficulties in defining them accurately, especially since, as another Government member pointed out, the nature of employment agencies was evolving constantly.

42. Some Government members indicated that they could identify only two major groups of employment agencies: intermediaries which provided services related to recruitment and contract labour firms such as TWAs.

43. It appeared that the majority of States which had experienced a rapid growth in the number and volume of activity of employment agencies chose to allow these agencies to develop, adapting national legislation and, in some cases, denouncing Convention No. 96 or not applying it strictly. A considerable number chose to control and regulate the activity of agencies along the lines indicated in Convention No. 96 in order to give continued protection to jobseekers and workers in general.

44. Several Employers' members explained that States, which were faced with considerable growth in the range and number of employment agencies, had been reluctant to exercise control through, inter alia, the application of Convention No. 96. There had been few recent ratifications of that instrument and there were, as at the end of 1993, four denunciations. That showed the important role of employment agencies in many countries. In addition, some ratifying States were not strictly applying the provisions of the Convention.

45. An Employers' member drew attention to the decline of employment in the public sector and to the increase in employment in the industrial and service sectors. That had led to the growth of private employment agencies to compensate for a reduction in the activities of the public labour exchanges.

46. A Workers' member added that her Government continued to require agencies to have authorization to operate and that representative trade unions were actively involved in this procedure. It had also maintained a public placement service which was managed jointly with employers and workers. Placement was provided to all workers since it was not wise to leave only vulnerable groups to public services. In her view, a government should choose to give a boost to public employment services in order to provide social protection for all workers.

47. One Government member stressed the limited possibilities which governments had to control private employment agencies when there was a demand for their services and the actors on the market had accepted them. Another Government member stated that his country was preparing a Bill to restructure employment services. Another stated that while his Government had ratified Convention No. 96, it had maintained the state monopoly for the placement of workers. Private agencies were allowed to operate within agreements with the public service. The national employment service provided assistance in the selection and training of personnel and was therefore working for both employers and workers. Another Government member felt that public employment services had to be provided to everyone, while private agencies could choo[illegible]heir customers. However, employers could afford to pay when they needed well-qualified staff.

48. Several Employers' members attributed the growth of private employment agencies to their efficiency in finding market niches and providing value added services which were appreciated by enterprises as well as by jobseekers. This was particularly the case in times of increased sectoral and industrial specialization. Some members were of the view that the rapid response mechanisms of private employment agencies were their main asset. One Employers' member mentioned the positive contribution of these agencies in facilitating temporary workers in his country to obtain permanent employment.

49. Some members indicated that certain other factors had influenced the growth of private agencies in developing countries. While economic development was one of them, rising unemployment and the collapse of government employment services had also contributed to a demand for services from private agencies. Private employment agencies also benefited from the search for higher skills induced by structural adjustment programmes undertaken over the last decade. In these countries, the emergence of private employment agencies could be seen as a corollary to a democratization process.

50. One Workers' member noted that in countries in transition from a planned to a market economy, private employment agencies had responded rapidly to the new situation. That was facilitated by the fact that labour market institutions were still very underdeveloped in transition economies.

51. Several Workers' members drew attention to the fact that the growth of private employment agencies was often driven by a desire to reduce labour costs at the expense of the workers. This would affect both temporary and permanent staff. It would have serious consequences for wages, working conditions and for society as a whole. Cases were cited of private employment agencies entering into triangular employment contracts which were designed to circumvent the costs of industrial accident insurance and other obligations of employers and to shift these costs to workers. In another example, the PREA were used to circumvent laws against discrimination.

52. Several members agreed with the criticism levelled at Convention No. 96 in the Report of the Office. They also confirmed that the recent denunciations of this Convention reflected widespread dissatisfaction among member countries. The Convention imposed too restrictive a control. One Workers' member favoured maintaining the monopoly situation. Most members agreed that the changes in the labour market were moving towards less monopoly and thus away from the principles of Convention No. 96. One Employers' member noted that this Convention also led to confusion, since TWAs were sometimes considered as being covered under this heading. In the light of this, the Convention constituted an obstacle to the growth of private employment agencies. One Workers' member agreed that in the case of a revision of the Convention, accurate and clear definitions of employment agencies would be required. One Government member considered that Convention No. 96 was not conducive to the emergence of a dynamic partnership between public and private employment agencies.

53. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed the strong concern of his group about the negative impact of private employment agencies on industrial relations and the protection of workers. While some governments had established effective guidelines for stable industrial relations and sound practices, the experiences with private employment agencies were, in most cases, negative. That negative impact was evident in many aspects of collective bargaining where TWAs were used to weaken the bargaining power of trade unions, to prevent trade union recognition and for strike-breaking. Workers could appreciate the placement function but were opposed to the replacement function. Working conditions and social security were also adversely affected. As a result, industrial peace and the well-being of individuals were badly affected. Private employment agencies were changing the nature of traditional employment relations and institutions. In order to promote sound industrial relations, the Workers' members considered it necessary to establish and maintain standards to govern the conduct of private employment agencies.

54. Several Workers' members noted that private employment agencies could contribute to the emergence of dual labour markets. Examples were cited of subcontracting to unorganized sectors, the inadequacy or absence of collective agreements and the exploitation of young workers and other vulnerable groups. Another Workers' member noted that sound industrial relations could prevent the rise of dual labour markets. That view was supported by some Government members who considered collective agreements as the basis for fair and equal treatment and the guarantee of workers' rights in the activities involving private employment agencies.

55. On behalf of his group, the Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that the problems mentioned by the Workers' members reflected the changing conditions of industrial sectors and labour markets. The circumstances varied and countries were finding their own solutions to the participation of private employment agencies. Convention No. 96 was too rigid and international regulations would not be effective. One Government member described the particular situation in his country where cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with private employment agencies under the aegis of the national employment office, had led to improved transparency and better services. In this case, it was felt that Convention No. 96 had helped to prevent the emergence of dual labour markets.

56. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, stated that private employment agencies, including TWAs, should be treated as any other business. They should be subject to the normal rule of law, and of labour law where relevant. Cases of malpractice or abuse should be dealt with by the courts. All businesses should be on the same footing and there should be no particular disadvantages for private agencies. The only exception was that jobseekers should not be charged a fee, except in cases where career planning services were provided.

57. According to one Employers' member, the cases of abuse that had been reported did not provide a basis for arguing that private agencies should not exist. Labour laws should protect workers and therefore there was no need to have special laws. TWAs in his country provided highly skilled workers who received correspondingly higher wages.

Examining future developments

58. One Workers' member suggested that there was no need for private placement services if the public services functioned well.

59. Many Workers' members supported the regulation of private agencies. They felt that a non-mandatory code of conduct was not sufficient to prevent abuses. There should be specific regulations governing the following: the various fields of activities of agencies; their responsibilities; the social protection of workers in the sector; transparency as regards the information held by the agencies (especially on personal data) and their relationship with public employment services. In addition, all agencies should have a renewable licence or authorization and the State should exercise supervision and control. There was also need for specific rules with respect to the fees charged, since they often represented a high proportion of workers' salaries. In any case, fees should not be charged to jobseekers and legislation should differentiate between profit-making and non-profit-making agencies.

60. Some Workers' members proposed that there should be specific regulations for placement agencies and for TWAs. Temporary workers should not earn less than permanent workers. The period of temporary work should be restricted and the use of temporary workers justified. TWAs should not be allowed to engage in placement services and their responsibilities should be specified. Consideration should be given to the adoption of a distinct Convention dealing with TWAs.

61. One Workers' member emphasized that legislation should aim at promoting the efficient functioning of the labour market. Since the public service covered the whole market, the compulsory notification of vacancies should be maintained. In this regard, one Workers' member and one Government member felt that the legal vacuum concerning private agencies which existed in certain countries of Eastern Europe needed to be filled.

62. Several Government members felt that special regulation was not necessary since agencies were subject to general commercial law and jobseekers had access to courts in case of malpractice. Self-regulation and codes of conduct would be more positive. For example, there was an international organization of TWAs which had a code of practice. The protection of workers should be left to national authorities in accordance with relevant law and practice. One Government member called for general regulations covering the activities of all agencies. It was, however, necessary to balance the need to eliminate abuses on the one hand and the demand for market flexibility on the other.

63. One Government member argued that since existing labour laws and collective agreements protected workers and TWAs were employers like others, there was no need for regulation in the context of Convention No. 96. On the contrary, there could be some relaxation of existing regulations. However, in the case of intermediaries engaged in placement, labour law did not cover the relationship between jobseekers and agencies. Consequently, in order to prevent abuses which could occur in such cases, regulation was necessary.

64. Some Government members believed that the fundamental rights of jobseekers should be protected and that the guaranteeing of such rights would not interfere with the efficient functioning of the labour market. One Government member favoured the control of agencies through licensing and approval of fees by the competent authority, while another Government member argued that in mature market economies where private employment agencies were firmly established with universally recognized codes of conduct, licensing and approval offices were no longer necessary forms of control. Others were of the opinion that specific regulations were necessary for various types of agencies.

65. On behalf of his group, the Employers' Vice-Chairman emphasized the complementarity between private and public employment agencies. The challenge was to find ways of providing a total service to the public. The form which such complementarity would take would depend on a large number of factors. The differences in social and economic conditions that prevailed in countries led to marked variations in regulations and industrial relations practices. The behaviour of employment agencies was influenced by the legal framework and economic environment of the countries in which they operated, by arrangements for self-regulation as well as by other circumstances. Since all these elements play an important role at the national level, there is no universal model.

66. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stressed that coexistence and complementarity implied that public and private employment agencies should be on an equal footing. Complementarity did not exclude cooperation or competition. In this respect, he endorsed the positive view of coexistence embodied in the Report prepared by the Office. For example, governments could make public employment agencies more competitive by upgrading their services to the public. Several Employers' members supported that view. They regarded coexistence as serving national employment objectives. Within the guarantees provided by the State for the protection of workers, private employment agencies fulfilled a useful function in both economic and social terms. They were interested in opportunities in the labour market, improved access, the provision of training and the creation of jobs. That allowed public employment agencies to concentrate on other tasks. In such a context, Convention No. 96 was considered to be completely outdated.

67. Several Employers' members gave examples of the benefits derived from the activities of private employment agencies. Besides income, access to permanent jobs and training, those advantages included the gaining of experience at the workplace and exposure to industrial relations practices. That was of particular value to young workers. They also drew attention to the fact that TWAs did not disregard vulnerable groups in the labour market.

68. Several Workers' members felt that in reality the labour market was characterized by a competitive environment and not by coexistence. The objective of private employment agencies was to make profits from jobseekers, not to reduce unemployment or to provide training. The result was often exploitation and therefore legislation was necessary, particularly in the case of temporary workers, who could be illegal immigrants in need of protection. Competition often did not improve the functioning of the labour market. Rather, it had negative effects such as social exclusion.

69. One Workers' member stressed that placement should remain the monopoly of the public employment service, except for a few specific categories of workers. Private employment agencies could make a contribution to the functioning of labour markets but only under the guidance of the public authorities which must enforce national laws and regulations. Another Workers' member proposed making a distinction between placement functions, where collaboration between public and private employment agencies would be desirable, and leasing through temporary work agencies which required special legislation. Other Workers' members did not support the idea of a monopoly, and they reminded the Employers that labour was not a commodity. One Workers' member questioned the usefulness of private employment agencies, since, at least in his country, the public employment services were doing an excellent job serving the public.

70. A number of Government members endorsed the approach to shared management of the labour market as put forward by the Office in Chapter VI of its report. However, they also felt that the concept required careful examination and further definition. One Government member was particularly critical of government control over information and the compulsory means suggested in the model provided. Several said that they would prefer to speak of developing a partnership between public and private agencies, without establishing a special regulatory framework for forging this cooperation. In their opinion, the market would provide for control and flexibility and abuses could be dealt with within existing legal frameworks in the fields of commercial and labour law. They emphasized the value of self-regulation and codes of conduct for minimizing the need for regulations and for enhancing the image of private employment agencies.

71. Several Government members stressed the need for both public and private employment agencies to be responsive to customers' demands. Healthy competition would help jobseekers to find jobs more quickly and stimulate improvement in the quality of services. This did not exclude cooperation in certain areas such as the advertising of vacancies through each other's agencies. Another Government member stated that competition and complementarity might exclude each other at a certain point. That may lead to specialization in certain fields and to limits as regards the options available to jobseekers. However, it would be very difficult to regulate this and general guidelines would not be possible. The objective should be to arrive at a system which ensures the best levels of efficiency in placement activities.

72. Some Government and Employers' members questioned the specific functions of agencies involved in shared management arrangements and, in particular, the responsibilities with respect to information. They felt that this could not be imposed, nor be subjected to monopolistic control. On the contrary, this function should grow with the roles that public and private agencies assumed in the partnership, based on their comparative advantages. Another Government member put emphasis on the need for transparency with regard to those functions in order to provide protection for workers.

73. Other Government members, while recognizing the positive effects of competition, emphasized the need to specify clearly the objectives of shared management approaches. Employment promotion and protection of the fundamental rights of jobseekers should guide this management function. Several Government members considered this an important subject for further investigation with a view to developing an international standard. One Government member emphasized that labour markets required special treatment and could not be considered as any other market. Special regulations would remain necessary. Partnership would only be possible with the public authorities playing a leading role and transparency characterizing the activities of all concerned.

74. Several Employers' members endorsed the opinions of the members of the Government group with respect to shared management, complementarity of functions and the incentive-oriented approach advocated by the Office in its report.

Guidelines for further action

75. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, believed that the maintenance of the principle of state monopoly was incompatible with the requirements of the labour market. Today the only sensible solution to this problem, which would satisfy both employers' and workers' needs, was coexistence founded on equality with no restrictive controls from public authorities. The only mandatory measure should be that a jobseeker should not be charged to obtain a job.

76. A member of the Employers' group indicated that his country could not ratify Convention No. 96 because such public monopolies were unconstitutional unless there was a consensus in parliament. Other members of the Employers' group also expressed their opposition to state monopoly. One of them, referring to the Workers' position on Part II of Convention No. 96, stated that this part of the Convention should reflect the ideals of the Organization without ignoring the real world and the contemporary values of member States of the ILO. Another Employers' member believed that those who adopted the Convention in 1949 acted in good faith and the provisions of that instrument reflected the belief of the time, that state intervention was necessary. Future changes were not envisioned. Another member of the Employers' group pointed out that private agencies were helping a very large number of jobseekers to find jobs. In the European Union, one million workers were employed daily by TWAs. These agencies were leaders as regards training and their profits were derived from their ability to respond to the needs of their customers. They should be allowed to operate side by side with the public sector. In conclusion, it was argued that monopolies were obsolete and that they had "lost their credibility".

77. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Workers' group, remarked that Part II of Convention No. 96, which dealt with the progressive abolition of fee-charging agencies, was optional. States could regulate the activities of these agencies. States could opt for a monopoly and they should not be prevented from making that choice if they considered it necessary. Where there was no state monopoly, agencies should be regulated to prevent them from violating the rights of jobseekers and workers. Convention No. 96 and other ILO standards were set by visionaries and were applicable universally. He was not opposed to change but believed that the Committee should be cautious in recommending the revision of the Convention. Some Workers' members recalled the responsibility of the main actors in the labour market, namely, the government, the employers, the trade unions and the public labour administration.

78. A number of Government members also expressed the view that a public employment service in a monopoly position could not respond to all the needs of employers and jobseekers. They argued in favour of more competition and less centralization and "authoritarianism". Strict control was very costly to implement. In addition, many national constitutions and international treaties made monopolies illegal. There were members in favour of the coexistence of public and private employment services, with more cooperation and competition between private and public services, and among private agencies. In their view, it was best to leave States to formulate national policy and legislation in accordance with national needs and realities.

79. One Government member indicated that the employment service policy of his country was both formulated and applied in close cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations. With the exception of certain sectors, placement services were provided by the State. He argued that it was not a monopolistic arrangement since there was joint management and, moreover, TWAs were very active.

80. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of his group, stated that the general discussion had provided ample evidence of the need to revise Convention No. 96 and to bring ILO standards into line with present and future needs of the labour market. Private employment agencies could make an important contribution to the future development of the labour market by matching requirements with skills. The objective should be to take maximum advantage of the dynamics of the labour market. The spirit of Convention No. 96 with its emphasis on regulations was not conducive to the attainment of that objective.

81. Several members of the Committee emphasized the need to revise Convention No. 96 as well as Convention No. 88 and Recommendation No. 83, in the light of actual and expected conditions in the labour market. One Government member, who favoured a comprehensive revision, urged that there be careful consideration and consultations with respect to the following: frameworks for the promotion of employment; programmes for improving the labour market; information flows between public and private agencies and institutional frameworks governing, inter alia, labour relations. Other Government members stressed that if there were to be a revision of Convention No. 96 the focus should be on laying down principles for the provision of services rather than on who provides the service. Details should be left to national law and practice, within a framework for removing obstacles to effective labour market operations. Employers' members supported that approach for maximizing cooperation between private and public employment agencies. In their view that would contribute to job creation and full employment. They emphasized that Convention No. 96 and, in particular, Part II did not respond to the requirements of the modern world.

82. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, on behalf of his group, agreed that new standards were required and that the increase in private employment agencies could not be disputed. However, such growth should be stemmed when there were gross violations of workers' rights. The Workers' members, he said, could cite many examples of private employment agencies being used to circumvent labour relations. He gave examples of unlawful practices which, according to some, infiltrated these types of businesses. The operations of private employment agencies, and particularly temporary work agencies, staff leasing companies and those involved with contract labour, had a negative impact on the framework of industrial relations. While the objective remained to provide adequate services of good quality, covering the entire labour market, employers should fulfil their social obligations.

83. Several Workers' members illustrated the abuses mentioned by the Vice-Chairman of their group. One Workers' member described vividly how in labour-exporting countries, prospective workers were forced to sell their meagre assets, for example the family's water buffalo, in order to obtain or keep a contract. Once they had a contract, they were victims of violations of their rights as workers. In addition, both the home and the host countries were often deceived by the agencies for overseas placement, as the skills delivered did not always correspond to the demand. In labour-importing countries, underground activities and the recruitment of illegal immigrants undermined collective agreements and social security regulations. Since a main objective of those agencies was to avoid taxation, fictitious employment contracts were often being used.

84. On behalf of the Workers' group, the Vice-Chairman announced that his group would seek a revision of only Convention No. 96 in order to take account of the growth of private employment agencies. Universally applicable guidelines should promote a stable framework for industrial relations, protection of workers' rights, productive employment for both workers and the unemployed as well as the promotion and protection of collective bargaining relationships. These should include the following principles: no charging of fees for the services of public employment agencies and no charging of fees for the services of private employment agencies; prevention of discriminatory practices; protection of the privacy of information; transparency of labour market operations; transfer of information pertaining to the matching of functions and definition of the functions and legal status of private employment agencies. A Workers' member, while supporting the proposals made by the Vice-Chairman of his group, reiterated that changes to Convention No. 96 and the implementation of new provisions should take place within a framework of social partnership.

85. Several Employers' members emphasized that a completely new approach was necessary for dealing with the issues covered by Convention No. 96 and related instruments. A reasonable framework of rules should be established so that workers would not be at a disadvantage, that confidentiality would be guaranteed and that obligations in the field of social security would be respected. They felt that the differences of opinion between workers and employers in this matter, could be bridged. The Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group reaffirmed that if there were alleged abuses, the remedy would not be to impose more regulations, but rather to provide a healthy and flexible environment for growth and to take advantage of the dynamic conditions in the market.

86. Several Government members expressed support for the flexible framework proposed by the Employers' group for the operations of public and private employment agencies. They recognized that there were possibilities for abuse but considered it more appropriate to deal with such cases by applying existing business law and common law, or by reference to conventions other than Convention No. 96. That was to be recommended particularly in times when labour markers were undergoing turbulent changes. Any other approach would not only be ineffective but also costly. They felt confident that much could be gained by reinforcing the methods and practices of self-regulation which had gained strength and popularity in various countries. They also considered it necessary to make available free and efficient services through public employment agencies in order to provide freedom of choice as well as effectiveness in the overall operations of the labour market. Other Government members emphasized that governments had a responsibility to see to it that a framework applicable to all agencies was established. That would promote conditions whereby private employment agencies would evolve into honest brokers, defending the interests of both employers and jobseekers. The Government's role could then be to monitor the situation in order to prevent major deviations from the labour market policy framework. Partnership and self-regulation would be key concepts for such a framework. However, in certain cases, such as the placement of foreign workers, there might be a need for special regulations.

Consideration of the draft resolution and conclusions submitted by the Working Party

87. At the 11th sitting of the Committee, the Chairperson of the Committee invited the Government member of Sweden and Chairman of the Working Party to introduce the draft resolution and conclusions that had been drawn up by the Working Party. The Chairman of the Working Party pointed out that the discussions of the Committee had provided a solid basis for the work of the Working Party. The first draft of the conclusions had been almost rejected outright but a second draft had taken into account all the various positions and was therefore acceptable as a basis on which to work. He stressed that the deliberations of the Working Party had shown tripartism at its best. He felt that the draft conclusions submitted by the Working Party to the Committee represented a body of new principles and a worldwide consensus of views on the issues concerned. These conclusions, if accepted by the Committee and the Conference, would open a long process of consultations and research leading to the consideration of a new standard. He urged the Committee to adopt the conclusions which, he believed, were forward-looking and paved the way for the future work of the ILO in that field.

88. Speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, the Workers' Vice-Chairman recalled the fine spirit of cooperation which had prevailed during the intensive discussions in the Working Party. The Workers' members noted with gratitude that the principles concerning the rights of jobseekers and sound industrial relations had been fully taken into account. The Workers' Vice-Chairman added that the draft resolution and conclusions constituted a complete document and that the sections should be considered as being complementary to each other. It would be difficult to amend a text which had been established after so much hard work.

89. In the view of the Workers' members the draft resolution and conclusions also reflected the opinions of the group. In particular, the Workers' members insisted that the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) should not be changed. The Workers' Vice-Chairman requested that the text of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96), as well as the list of countries which had ratified it, be attached to the report of the Committee. In addition, he said that the Workers' members considered that discrimination, as mentioned in paragraph 13 of the draft conclusions, should be understood in a broad sense, including discrimination against women and disabled persons. He noted that women were often the main victims of abuses by some private employment agencies, although he hastened to add that this was certainly no reflection on the practices of the many private employment agencies which had introduced acceptable rules of conduct. He also recalled that paragraph 30 of the conclusions, with respect to misconduct in the field of employment, would have a strong impact on the social lives of the people concerned. With regard to the principle that fees should not be charged to the jobseeker (paragraph 53), the Workers' members wanted the exceptions to be restricted so as not to charge fees even to high-level professionals if they were unemployed and seeking a job.

90. The Workers' Vice-Chairman endorsed the proposal to adopt the draft resolution and conclusions. He thanked the Government members of the Working Party, who had represented the interests of all three groups, as well as the Employers' members who had recognized the importance of industrial relations and compromise.

91. Speaking on behalf of the Employers' members, the Employers' Vice-Chairman expressed satisfaction at the significant results achieved by the Working Party. The Employers' members were particularly pleased that it had been recognized that times were changing and that private employment agencies could make an important contribution to the functioning of the labour market. In reality the monopoly concept contained in Convention No. 96 was outdated.

92. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that the draft resolution and conclusions were the outcome of an active tripartite process, to which all parties had contributed with their ideas and concerns in a very constructive manner. He paid tribute to the contributions of the Workers' members and to the role played by the Government members in the Working Party. He also thanked the representatives of the different groups and individuals for their inputs during the discussions in the Committee and in the Working Party.

93. Speaking on behalf of the Employers' members, the Employers' Vice-Chairman recommended the adoption of the draft resolution and conclusions.

94. One Government member, speaking on behalf of the industrialized market economy countries as well as on behalf of some other Government members who had contributed to the work of the Working Party, acknowledged the sincere cooperation which had prevailed in the Working Party. She was pleased that the document, although only a first step, was a basis from which to move forward. It reflected the need to keep in touch with economic changes as well as the dynamism of the labour market. She was strongly of the opinion that any new ILO standard would strengthen employment services in all countries. The challenge was to find a balance between a flexible and useful employment policy and the rights of workers. The cooperation with which the Committee had approached its task boded well for the future. In her opinion the process of tripartism was alive and well.

95. The Committee adopted the draft conclusions without change.

Adoption of the report including resolutions and conclusions

96. At its 11th and final sitting the Committee met to conclude its business. The Chairperson recalled that the Committee had examined and adopted the draft resolution and conclusions at its tenth sitting and invited the Government member of Sweden to introduce the draft report in his capacity as Reporter of the Committee. The Reporter stated that the report reflected an effort to provide a comprehensive summary of the contributions made by members of the Committee. It highlighted the substance of the ideas put forward rather than merely providing a record of who had made the interventions.

97. The Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, endorsed the draft report. During the consideration of the text, he proposed several changes and additions which were all adopted without discussion.

98. Speaking on behalf of the Employers' members, the Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group shared the view that the draft report reflected the main points made during the discussions. Some subjects could have been given somewhat more emphasis than others, but the members of his group did not feel that this warranted any substantive amendment of the draft text.

99. The representative of the Government members felt that the draft report was a balanced representation of the views expressed during the discussions. Although there were minor changes proposed by members of the Government group, it nevertheless endorsed the adoption of the report.

100. In their concluding remarks, the Chairperson, the two Vice-Chairmen, the representative of the Government group and the Reporter expressed pride and satisfaction at having been part of this truly tripartite achievement. It had offered a new approach to the issues concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets. In her final address of farewell and thanks, the Chairperson commended the amount of work done in such a short space of time. The spirit of cooperation and consensus that had prevailed throughout the negotiations had culminated in the unanimous adoption of the report. She recalled that by virtue of the work of the Committee, the ultimate goal — the revision of ILO Convention No. 96 — was well on the way to being achieved.

101. The report of the Committee, the resolution and the conclusions, as adopted by the Committee, are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Resolution concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization, meeting at its 81st Session (1994),

Having undertaken a comprehensive review of the functions and practices of employment agencies on the basis of Report VI entitled "The role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets",

Recalling that the Governing Body at its 254th (November 1992) Session decided to place the item on the agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference as a general discussion item,

Having regard to the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) and its accompanying Recommendation, 1948 (No. 83) as well as the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96),

Takes note of the following conclusions and invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to give due consideration to them.

Conclusions concerning the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets

Introduction

1. The Committee discussed the role of private employment agencies in the functioning of labour markets against the background of widespread concern with unemployment and poverty. The ILO strived to make full and productive employment the top priority on the agenda of policy-makers. This social objective should be supported by public, economic and financial policies which enhance sustainable economic development. Developing countries were not alone in facing increasing difficulties to ensure that there was support for the unemployed, those out of the labour force, the working poor and those having to face poor conditions of work. Social and economic issues, as well as policy options, were closely interrelated and had both short- and longer-term dimensions. It was in this wider framework that the Committee had reviewed the contributions made by public and private employment agencies.

2. The Committee had grouped its conclusions under 12 headings ordered in sequence from A to L as follows: (A) definition of a well-functioning labour market; (B) labour-market policy and actors in the labour market; (C) the role of public employment services (PES); (D) definition and typology of private employment agencies (PREA); (E) place and role of PREA; (F) practices of PREA; (G) objective and scope of regulations; (H) means for sound practice by PREA other than traditional regulation; (I) relationship between PES and PREA; (J) the case for better and increased cooperation; (K) relevant ILO standards; (L) prospects for future ILO standards.

A. Definition of a well-functioning labour market

3. The deliberations in the Committee clearly showed that all those involved in the activities of the labour market — workers, their representatives, employers and governments — took great interest in the functioning of the labour market and were concerned about the developments and ongoing changes in that market. The Committee found that all these interests and concerns formed a solid basis for the pursuit of the goal of improving the functioning of labour markets throughout the world, to create new jobs, to help jobseekers to find suitable jobs so that they could support themselves and their families and to help employers to develop their businesses through the recruitment of skilled and suitable workers. The Committee also found that there was still total consent on the fundamental principle, laid down in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, that labour is not a commodity and that the freedom of jobseekers to search for jobs and the right for employers to take decisions concerning the recruitment of workers were fundamental elements in free market and mixed economies. The Committee also stressed the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining as well as the promotion of employment creation in an industrial relations context that was effective, and in which workers' rights were fully respected.

4. These principles, however, did not exclude the possibility that measures might be needed to improve the functioning of labour markets and to look closely into the present international standard, namely Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96). The Committee thoroughly discussed the activities of the labour market and examined in depth the actions of those who operated in the labour market.

5. There was general consent that labour markets were no longer stable, that changes in international and national economies had a great impact on labour markets and that there was a general acceleration in those changes which could have enormous consequences, both for enterprises and not least for workers and their families. The conditions which prevailed at the beginning of the twentieth century, and which influenced the labour standard under discussion in the Committee, no longer existed in most countries, whereas they were still present in others. There seemed to be a general worldwide trend to recognize the need to respond to change by employers, workers and governments when it came to forms of employment, interventions to influence the markets and the organization of workplaces.

6. Three fundamental functions could be identified in the labour market. First, it was a marketplace where jobseekers and employers had the opportunity to find each other. Secondly, it was a source of information about jobseekers and vacancies which could be used by jobseekers, employers and governments to follow changes in the market in order to take necessary decisions concerning that market. Thirdly, it was a place where States could introduce the necessary programmes and incentives to influence the functioning of the market.

B. Labour-market policy and actors in the labour market

7. When looking at the labour market and its function as a market-place, the Committee found that a wide range of activities took place to help jobseekers and employers to find each other and conclude contracts of employment. In many countries, public employment agencies were predominant whereas private actors, both those working for profit and non-profit organizations, appeared more frequently in others. Very few countries seemed to comply with the general principles of Convention No. 96 that public agencies should be the rule and private employment agencies should be abolished as soon as possible.

8. The ILO report defined at least 16 different varieties of private employment agencies. It was clear that economic change would cause other kinds of agencies to develop in the future. The Committee recognized the freedom of employers, subject to national law and practice, to fulfil their recruitment needs through the use of these agencies.

9. The Committee also found that it was time to recognize the need for a wide variety of activities to be undertaken to help jobseekers and employers to find each other and to increase the activities on the market-place for jobs. Both public and private actors complemented each other in the market-place.

10. The Committee found, however, that it was a fundamental responsibility of States to see to it that the labour market was functioning well and to assume that responsibility by guaranteeing that there was an adequately-funded and well-functioning public employment service free of charge for jobseekers.

11. When it came to information about the labour market, the Committee found that it should be the responsibility of States to guarantee that information about jobseekers and vacancies was available to employers and workers, and that adequate statistical information existed to meet the need for action on the labour market. Whether the gathering and distribution of information should be public or private was not an issue to be determined by international labour standards, since traditions, legal frameworks and national practices varied between member States. In the upgrading of national employment market information systems and networking, it seemed desirable, however, that the ILO and other international agencies should, upon request, provide assistance to developing countries and to those countries undergoing transformation to market economies. This would enable them to collect, analyse and disseminate accurate and timely labour market information in establishing and developing databanks.

12. The Committee firmly believed that States must take care to guarantee the right of individuals to have their personal integrity protected when information was processed on the labour market.

13. The Committee found that it was an important role for States, through employment programmes and other means, to influence the labour market in order to improve its functioning and facilitate employment for all jobseekers, including the unskilled and the vulnerable jobseekers such as workers with family responsibilities, on the basis of non-discrimination and freedom of access to the labour market. The importance of government activities to create new jobs and to improve possibilities for jobseekers and employers to enter into contracts of employment remained totally undisputed.

14. The background for the conclusions as drawn up by the Committee were further discussed in the following sections.

C. The role of public employment services (PES)

15. The Committee expressed its continuing support for the principles set out in Employment Services Convention, 1948 (No. 88) and, in particular, the duty of the employment services to ensure, where necessary, in cooperation with other public and private bodies concerned, the best possible organization of the labour market.

16. Having recognized this essential role, governments had generally given these services the financial and other means to plan and implement their labour-market policies. In order to implement these policies, they had mainly concentrated on placement, guidance, employment training, labour market information, programmes for job, skill and geographical mobility, promotion and management of subsidized employment schemes, unemployment insurance, etc. In some countries, these programmes had been placed under the responsibility of several public institutions but remained coordinated by the PES.

17. For a very long time some countries were split among those which proceeded on the assumption that the labour market worked best when it was managed exclusively by public entities, mainly the PES, and those which took the view that the labour market worked best when it permitted PREA to operate side by side with PES.

18. Standards adopted by the ILO on the subject in 1949 clearly showed that the predominant view was that the labour market works best in the absence, or with the very limited presence, of PREA. That view also seemed to have been supported by the number of governments which had ratified the relevant ILO Conventions in this field.

19. Given the dynamic conditions of the labour market in recent years, it had become clear that the growing role and place of well-functioning PREA could be positive and that the essential role played by the PES had been and must be maintained. It was the general view that only a public entity such as the PES could be made responsible for such functions as management of unemployment insurance, labour-market information, management of special programmes to lead the most vulnerable jobseekers to the threshold of employability, and the management of subsidized job-promotion schemes.

20. For those reasons, the Committee believed that any consideration of the role and functions of PREA would be incomplete if considered in isolation from those of PES or outside the context of an effective labour market policy. Moreover, in view of their overall responsibilities for the labour market, the Committee found that some States might want to maintain a monopoly in those functions which they considered appropriate.

D. Definition and typology of private employment agencies (PREA)

21. PREA may be defined as private firms directly or indirectly providing a service in the labour market. The definition proposed in Chapter 2 of the ILO report could be considered as being both too extensive and too restrictive when referring to specific national conditions. Similarly, only national situations could give precise substance to the notion of private, which could relate to the nature of the capital, the type of law governing its activities or to whether the agency was profit or non-profit making. However, the definition in the ILO report was a useful reference for national circumstances.

22. Similar considerations applied concerning the typology proposed in the ILO report. In some countries some of the agencies listed were irrelevant or non-existent, or classified as service firms outside the employment field. In other countries, PREA were grouped into two categories, those providing a service (brokers or otherwise) in a one-to-one contractual relationship and those establishing a triangular contractual relationship, such as in the case of temporary work agencies. In other countries a legal distinction was made according to whether agencies, whatever their activity, were profit or non-profit making. The Committee considered it useful, however, for the ILO to continue to build on the classification provided in the report in order to make available for permanent future reference, at the request of governments, employers or workers organizations, an updated description of the agencies contained in the typology. This should not, however, preclude the pursuit of a more generic approach of describing PREA when considering a revised standard.

23. Temporary work agencies were one of the major types of firms mentioned in the ILO typology. The role that these agencies played in the market, the very particular nature of the triangular relationship which they entered into, and the legal problems deriving therefrom, explained why some governments had enacted special laws to regulate their activities. In some of these cases temporary work agencies were dealt with as quite distinct agencies.

24. The Committee considered that certain types of agency that were scarcely mentioned in the ILO report, and which operated in markets of developing countries, deserved special attention and possible regulation by national governments in relation to abuses which are committed, particularly in the case of contract labour agencies which hire home workers for processing particular goods (e.g. cigarette rolling, hides, etc.) or those that charge fees from jobseekers in exchange for the promise of employment abroad. These agencies should be considered in any future ILO discussion of private employment agencies.

E. Place and role of PREA

25. The Committee acknowledged that in a rapidly changing world, PREA had increased spectacularly in size and importance and had acquired growing recognition as important elements in labour markets.

26. The Committee concluded that well-functioning PREA could most certainly contribute to the effective functioning of the labour market. PREA could in many instances:

— reduce the time needed to fill vacancies;

— bring vacancies to the surface in the open market;

— sense changes in labour-market requirements and react quickly, avoiding delays and imbalances;

— match supply and demand of skills through relevant selection and recruitment methods, thus saving waste due to avoidable manpower turnover;

— satisfy needs not satisfactorily covered by public agencies due to the growing complexity in demand and supply of skills;

— build a bridge between unemployment and permanent employment by providing, mainly through temporary work assignments, gradual incorporation of jobseekers (especially new entrants or re-entrants) into the labour market;

— multiply the sources of information on job opportunities, thus increasing the overall stock of available information on the job market;

— reduce the time of deployment from one job to the other through outplacement techniques, thus contributing to a better labour force mobility;

— provide short-term employment training thus contributing to bridge the gap between the supply and demand of skills.

27. Overall, PREA' activities added value to the labour market as market-place forces had shown through the growing demand for the services they provided. The fact that the activities of PREA had grown in quantity and quality and that governments had acknowledged that growth in their legislation, as shown in Chapter 3 of the ILO Report dealing with this question, were indicators of their contribution to the formation of wealth and of the value attributed by the market to the services offered by these agencies.

28. The Committee also noted that both workers' and employers' organizations might operate successfully as PREA.

F. Practices of PREA

29. The Committee acknowledged the fact that there were numerous concerns regarding the ethics of PREA, and that PREA were sometimes singled out for poor practices in relation to the interests of workers and jobseekers. During the Committee's deliberations this perception was frequently directed at temporary work agencies (TWAs). Whatever the circumstances, the behaviour of PREA called for rules to prevent or discourage them from engaging in conduct or practices that undermined workers' rights, be they in the areas of wages, general conditions of work, industrial relations or safety and health.

30. Misconduct in the field of employment must be underscored because it was there that people's jobs and people's professional lives were at stake. Means must be available to deal with PREA which were found to be in violation of laws and regulations.

31. The circumstances in which PREA operated and the employment relationships they entered into with jobseekers could often lead to exploitation and improper conduct. The Committee had listened to allegations from Workers' members describing how some PREA had circumvented laws to help employers reduce workers' wages, to render trade union organization difficult or impossible, to ignore regulations concerning equal opportunities, to avoid paying benefits to which workers were legally entitled and to aid in the process of replacing permanent with temporary jobs.

32. The Committee's recognition of the importance and relevance of the role of PREA in labour markets should in no way be interpreted as an endorsement of any infringements they might commit of the laws that exist to protect workers' rights and interests. If new international standards were to be drawn up on this subject, special care should be taken to include provisions ensuring adequate protection against such abuses for workers and jobseekers alike to the extent that these were not guaranteed by other ILO standards.

33. Special attention should be given to those agencies which did placements abroad due to the serious consequences of some unfair practices for both workers and employers.

G. Objective and scope of regulations

34. The Committee acknowledged that PREA should not and might not wish to operate in an environment without rules. The Committee agreed that there might be several sources of rules governing the activities of PREA. These possible sources were: common business law, labour law, business and labour jurisprudence, collective agreements, specific laws and rules dealing with PREA, professional codes of conduct adopted by associations of PREA, internal rules of these agencies as well as ILO Conventions and Recommendations.

35. Each national context determined the nature of the rules governing PREA. The mix of rules originating from different sources depended on the maturity of the labour market, the culture and behaviour of its actors, existing traditions and practice in collective bargaining, etc. In some labour markets, when the risk of unprofessional behaviour was high, specific rules directed at PREA and the adoption of a licensing system might be recommended. In others, where a tradition of fair practice was well established, common business law complemented by codes of professional ethics could form a satisfactory regulatory framework. In others still, collective agreements could provide a reliable legal basis.

36. The Committee was well aware of the dangers of over-regulation. The worst that could happen was for PREA to be governed by several redundant, incompatible or contradictory rules emanating from different legal sources. For example, a law on the protection of confidentiality and a specific law on some PREA could be contradictory in regulating the treatment of computerized personal files. Similarly, different PREA competing in the same segment of the market and offering similar services could be regulated by different laws: common business law for one, a specific law for the other.

37. The general approach that the Committee supported was for governments to adopt a pragmatic attitude concerning the regulation of PREA. Governments should rely on the laws and rules in force, whenever possible, before considering specific regulations.

38. In all cases, regulations concerning PREA should be designed in consultation with representatives of the business concerned and with workers' organizations.

H. Means for sound practice other than traditional regulations

39. The Committee recognized that governments might seek other means than the traditional legal or regulatory instruments to establish fair practice by those who had a role in the labour market. Some of these means consisted in setting common professional codes of conduct governing the following: professionals from the public or private sectors dealing with jobseekers; certification of the profession of employment adviser (in the same way as was done in some countries for translators or accountants); common job classification within the employment service sector, as well as social partner-based councils to discuss policy and performance.

40. Similarly, the Committee believed that both PES and PREA could agree, in a more or less formal way, on common standards of fair practice such as the fair use of appropriate selection tests, vacancy advertisements, interviewing and investigation methods prior to hiring.

I. Relationship between PES and PREA

41. In many countries PES and PREA tended to operate separately. PES were generally available to all job seekers and served in particular the disadvantaged and the lower-skilled jobseekers. PREA addressed the market of the rare, specialized or higher skills where prior selection was crucial to hiring, the temporary job market, or specific segments of the market requiring particular services such as outplacement. Overlapping on the same market by PES and PREA was more the exception than the rule.

42. The Committee believed that there was scope for increased cooperation between the PES and PREA. Many PES could not afford to enter into direct competition, even where such competition might be beneficial. PES must however endeavour to offer the best range of services possible, in order to ensure that they fulfilled their social duties towards all jobseekers, including the disadvantaged, and offered the common employer a means to satisfy his staffing needs. Labour-market cooperation between all the actors would assist in the provision of the broadest scope of services.

43. For this relationship to work effectively, the Committee would, for the most part, agree that fee charging by PES would not apply in relation to access to job vacancies.

J. The case for better and increased cooperation

44. The Committee expressed its firm support for all attempts to establish permanent cooperation between PES and PREA. It was indeed the Committee's opinion that cooperation was a desirable institutional form of behaviour.

45. Cooperation between public institutions and private employment firms was not normally established by law. Rather, it was the result of tradition, administrative culture and behaviour by all actors in the labour market.

46. Yet, measures could be taken by governments to promote cooperation. For example, the practice of using private firms to implement labour-market schemes could lead to more and better cooperation. Similarly, the decision to advertise vacancies in each other's premises, or to allow mutual access to computerized vacancy files could also be conducive to improved working relations. In some countries, inviting staff from PREA to specialized training or seminars conducted by PES can develop a spirit of cooperation and understanding. Exchanging staff or sharing premises can be other unconventional and efficient ways of building beneficial personal contacts among staff of both organizations.

47. In general, cooperation could best be achieved when the PES recognized its value and coordinated with PREA to build the broadest possible spectrum of programmes.

48. For some countries a network of PREA complementing the activities of the PES could best be established through joint planning, delegation of specific duties and sharing of information.

K. Relevant ILO standards

49. Three main ILO standards dealt, directly or indirectly, with the activities of PREA. These were the Employment Services Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and its corresponding Recommendation No. 83 and the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96).

50. Most Committee members found that the principles underlying Convention No. 96 were not relevant to their national situations. It appeared obvious that this Convention had been adopted in line with the provisions contained in the previous standard adopted on this question, namely the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933 (No. 34), which openly opposed these institutions. The overt objective of Convention No. 96 was either to ban PREA or to place them under tight supervision by government authorities. As suggested in the preceding sections of this document, the Committee believed that all these principles, except the one referred to in paragraph 53 below, no longer corresponded to today's reality in modern labour markets.

51. Part II of Convention No. 96 appeared to be removed from current practice in most labour markets. The Committee was convinced that the four recent denunciations of this part of the Convention were only partial evidence of a more general loss of credibility toward the contents of this part of the standard.

52. Part III of Convention No. 96 in a number of respects did not reflect current realities: narrow scope (only the job brokerage service was considered); inflexible type of supervision (only the licensing system was envisaged); constraining (yearly renewal of licenses) or obsolete provisions in regard to current functioning of modern labour markets (notification to supervisory authority of fees charged to clients).

53. The Committee believed however that one provision contained in Convention No. 96 should be maintained, namely that concerning the payment of services offered by PREA. It was indeed essential to recall that, with very few exceptions such as services provided to high-level professionals and executives, the Committee remained in favour of the principle that fees should not be charged to the jobseeker.

L. Prospects for future ILO standards

54. The Committee held the view that the ILO should proceed to revise Convention No. 96.

55. It was the Committee's view that the revised standard should pursue the following objectives:

— set the pattern for response to the dynamics of changing labour-market functions and recall the role of its actors;

— draw up general parameters to describe the main actors, namely, the PES and PREA, as well as the nature of the relationship both between themselves and with their clients;

— establish general principles and provide guidance that protect:

  (i) labour markets against poor and unethical practices;

  (ii) workers' interests including where the stability of industrial relations' systems might be affected by some practices of PREA (these principles should consider the concerns of some (but not all) Committee members with regard to triangular employment relationships, including contract labour, TWAs and staff-leasing arrangements);

(iii) workers recruited in one country for work in another.

- create environments that allow for the improved functioning of all employment agencies;
- ensure that national governments would be free to determine how the above objectives would be met.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

CONVENTION No. 96

Convention concerning Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Revised 1949)[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Thirty-second Session on 8 June 1949, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933, adopted by the Conference at its Seventeenth Session, which is included in the tenth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having resolved that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention, complementary to the Employment Service Convention, 1948, which provides that each Member for which the Convention is in force shall maintain or ensure the maintenance of a free public employment service, and

Considering that such a service should be available to all categories of workers, adopts this first day of July of the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-nine the following Convention, which may be cited as the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949:

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

(b) employment agencies not conducted with a view to profit, that is to say, the placing services of any company, institution, agency or other organisation which, though not conducted with a view to deriving any pecuniary or other material advantage, levies from either employer or worker for the above services an entrance fee, a periodical contribution or any other charge.

2. This Convention does not apply to the placing of seamen.

Article 2

1. Each Member ratifying this Convention shall indicate in its instrument of ratification whether it accepts the provisions of Part II of the Convention, providing for the progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies con-

2. Any Member accepting the provisions of Part III of the Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General that it accepts the provisions of Part II ; as from the date of the registration of such notification by the Director-General, the provisions of Part III of the Convention shall cease to be applicable to the Member in question and the provisions of Part II shall apply to it.

(c) shall only place or recruit workers abroad if permitted so to do by the competent authority and under conditions determined by the laws or regulations in force.

Article 7

The competent authority shall take the necessary steps to satisfy itself that non-fee-charging employment agencies carry on their operations gratuitously.

TENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this morning is the adoption of the tenth report of the Selection Committee, which you will find in Provisional Record No. 3J.

I submit this report to you for adoption. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT – I give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference.

The CLERK OF THE CONFERENCE – I wish to inform the delegates that, because of an error in the English version of the report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives on programme and budget proposals and other financial questions, Provisional Record No. 15, adopted yesterday, the corrected document has been reproduced in Provisional Record No. 15 (rev.). The error was in Appendix II.

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (cont.)

The PRESIDENT – We will now continue with the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland) – I wish to congratulate the President and his colleagues on their election, and I also wish to add my warm personal congratulations to the official and institutional ones. It is befitting that in this anniversary year the highest office of the Conference is held by a representative of the workers for whose protection this Organization has been set up.

Later this week, we shall know how the Director-General has kept score of the different views on his Report, for which he deserves to be congratulated. He will be asked by the Resolutions Committee and thus by the Conference to examine and further process these views. This is what we all should do so that the Governing Body can take them up as of next November. I am convinced that the exercise will be more than just a simple tabulation of the interventions for or against any particular question, such as the social clause or strengthened standard setting.

I shall concentrate on these two issues, although many others would also merit discussion. There is just so much you can say in ten minutes. I wish to use mine to clarify further the social clause issue and to make comments on the question of standards.

We probably should find another expression for what in this debate has repeatedly been referred to as the social clause. There is no one ready-made product called the social clause which should or should not be integrated into trade policies and measures. There are many explanations and very many misrepresentations, some of them deliberate, on what we mean by this issue. I shall add my voice to those of my colleagues on the Workers' benches who in this debate have tried to set the record straight.

In his opening address, the President reminded us that the Versailles Peace Treaty already contained a "workers' bill of rights". These covered fundamental workers' rights which have a direct link to international trade and economic relations. They also guaranteed the freedom of association and the right to organize and bargain collectively, non-discrimination and the elimination of forced labour and child labour.

In order to illustrate what we are talking about I shall give a simple example which also shows that we do not even have to dive into the whole North-South issue to see the relevance of this question. In Finland, we are well aware that the wage levels in our two near neighbouring countries, Estonia and the Russian Federation, are quite different from ours. A worker in these countries might earn anything between 2 and 20 per cent of the Finnish wage, and it is quite obvious that Finnish enterprises will continue to invest in this area.

This is not for us a social-clause issue, although we know that there are shifts in employment from Finland to these areas. The Finnish Trade Unions wish to see more development in these regions, which are undergoing transition to a market economy. We understand the current situation and trust that these countries will be expanding markets for us. We have to look at the medium to longer-term perspective. Our assumption, hopefully justified, is that the trend of economic development, including that of wages and purchasing power, will be upward in our neighbouring areas.

Of course this calls for adjustment on our side, and it will not be easy for many workers. What I have said about Finland and its neighbours is true for all countries on or close to the former East-West divide. The key issue here is confidence that there will be positive economic and social development in countries which at present have some competitive edge through lower wages. In any case, shortcomings in the physical and social infrastructure and in domestic markets largely offset this competitive edge. Treating them will call for further investments, which again should be beneficial for the workers in the societies in transition.

All this can, however, in certain circumstances become a social- clause issue. If wage levels are kept low by denying workers the right to organize and bargain collectively, the situation changes. Then what is essentially a question of structural adjustment and transition becomes one of unfair competition. We have to have tools to deal with such situations. Perpetuating them is not a way to economic and social progress, it is exploitation.

I have used an example from our immediate vicinity, and not wanted to go far away or think in further global perspectives, simply in order to illustrate how intimately our concerns are linked to the rights of workers in all countries to organize and bargain freely for their fair share of the hopefully expanding cake. If they cannot do this, the cake will not grow either.

The second topic on which I want to speak is the standard-setting work of the ILO. Originally I wanted to make a statement to the effect that we should seriously think about the Director-General's observation that we may have been too "maximalist" in drafting Conventions, and that we might usefully take another look at the balance between what is in Conventions and what is in Recommendations.

In addition to having an appropriate balance between setting new standards and revising old ones, we could also look at some kind of issue-oriented codification of standards. As we have often noted, no one is suggesting a Convention on, say, poverty, and it might take some time to figure out what a Convention on globalization might look like. But in treating their effects on workers, we could pull out all the relevant standards we already have on the topic, have a look at their application, draw conclusions, and define where we have gaps which have to be filled.

We should have more discussion on these issues. However, this discussion has to be based on trust that all are genuinely looking for solutions. I do not want to feel that it is useless to make suggestions because others have already decided that standards should rather be done away with and that we are just wasting our time in tripartite discussions on them.

Or how am I to understand, for example, the words of the President of the Swedish Employers' Confederation in this debate, when he last Thursday declared that the ILO standard-setting machinery is counter-productive? Incidentally, he himself made the case for new standards on the issue of contract labour when he spoke of different employment relationships as new forms of contract. But where I disagree profoundly is when employers say that ILO standards are based on obsolete views of employer-employee relationships. The notion that these relationships should be a free-for-all is an expression of something I should like to describe as "anarcho-entrepreneurial" thinking.

Some employers who are obsessed by a competitive entrepreneurial environment seem to think that tripartism is almost like the dictatorship of the proletariat. In this vein they are also warning the emerging entrepreneurial class in Central and Eastern Europe about the dangers of cooperation to address employment and social questions. What I am concerned about is that they, in fact, are preaching a new kind of bolshevism: one based on market triumphalism. If this view gains serious ground, it will also be more, and not less, difficult to address sensibly the connection between workers' rights and trade issues.

I trust that at the end of the day, sensible women and men will once again sit down and address in practical terms the future of the ILO, including its standard-setting mechanism. But it would not hurt if the calls for reform could be taken up in an atmosphere of confidence. A genuine commitment to tackling change in a tripartite way, instead of using change to weaken tripartism, is a particularly appropriate confidence-building measure.

Original Portuguese: Mr. NHACA (Workers' adviser, Mozambique) – May I, on behalf of the Mozambique Workers' Organization, the OTM-CS, and the Mozambican workers in general, sincerely congratulate Mr. Gray on his election as President of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. We are convinced that under his wise leadership, the Conference will be able to achieve the results expected of it by the social partners and by the workers in particular.

This Conference is of historical significance because it is being held in the year that the ILO is commemorating its 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

Throughout these years of unstinting commitment, the ILO has played a crucial role in the struggle to promote social justice.

At the present time, with the challenges which we are facing, the ILO is more than ever needed to strengthen its position to ensure that international labour standards actually act as a reference point for national labour legislations.

The tripartite system, which the ILO pioneered, has shown how effective it is. Hence, we favour greater participation on the part of the social partners at all levels in the adoption and implementation of macroeconomic development policies.

In this context, governments should create the conditions necessary to strengthen the role of the social partners.

As far as we are concerned, strengthening the tripartite system cannot be viewed as an obstacle to economic reforms. On the contrary, the strengthening of this role constitutes an important factor in the effective participation of the social partners in designing and implementing macroeconomic policies for economic and social development.

As for the structural adjustment programme, which has been under way in our country since 1987, we Mozambique workers consider that, since each country has its own specific characteristics and situations, no single model can be transferred in a rigid, automatic or standardized manner from one country to another.

In the specific case of Mozambique, the structural adjustment programme has been fundamentally influenced by three endogenous and interdependent processes, namely: the move from a single-party system to a multi-party system; the move from a centralized economy to a market economy; and the move from a country devastated by prolonged war to an economy restimulated for national reconstruction.

Obviously, the simultaneous occurrence of such complex processes of transition superimposed on weak and deeply rooted structures, and widespread poverty, shows that Mozambique's development problems can be overcome only through political and social stability and through a change in attitude of potential creditors in the face of Mozambique's specific post-war problems.

The problems of the African continent, and of Mozambique in particular, require a more realistic attitude and the application of measures adapted to reality. It is necessary to progress very slowly and to attack, in a realistic and objective fashion, the problems of dependence on foreign debt, the unbearable weight of the debt burden, the lack of foreign financing, and the lack of inputs, due to the constant devaluations of the currency and rising debt servicing costs.

Since three-quarters of the world's population are to be found in the developing countries, these are questions that may legitimately be asked. For us it is socially unfair that such a large part of the world's population is excluded from any possibility whatsoever of participating in the design of feasible economic and social development strategies and is considered a mere spectator, with all the negative consequences on social equilibrium and the survival of fragile emerging democracies.

That is why it is indispensable and urgent for international credit institutions to show understanding for the seriousness of these problems, not only through formal declarations of intentions as has been the practice in the past, but through specific concrete and comprehensive actions so as to rectify everything which is not able to withstand the pressure of reality.

We, Mozambique workers, are constantly and increasingly disappointed and disillusioned with the ruinous results of the structural adjustment programme; if its mentors cannot take into account the signals sent out by the trade union movements day after day, these programmes will no longer be able to count on our sympathy.

Original Arabic: Mr. RASSOUL (representative, Arab Labour Organization) – I am proud to address your Conference on behalf of the Arab Labour Organization, which I have the honour to represent at this landmark session. I should first like to congratulate the Conference on its felicitous choice of Mr. Charles Gray as President of this session. The results achieved by the Conference to date confirm the wisdom of that choice for this historic session as well as the qualifications and competence of the workers to occupy the highest offices in the Organization's decision-making bodies.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the States that have recently joined the ILO family, including our brother country the Sultanate of Oman, whose membership completes the list of Arab States forming part of this Organization pending, God willing, the membership of the State of Palestine in the near future, an event that will complete the universality of this venerable Organization.

Last April the tripartite members of the Arab Labour Organization celebrated at their General Conference the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The guest of honour at the celebrations was our friend Mr. Michel Hansenne, who saw for himself the esteem in which the ILO is held by the representatives of production, development and labour in the Arab nation, the pride they take in their membership of the ILO and their attachment to its values and lofty aims, which have been consolidated and have spread with the passage of time, and which may be summarized as the protection of the dignity of labour. We in the Arab Labour Organization rely on tripartite representation and dialogue among the Arab social partners as our model for fulfilment of its mandate, policies and national programmes. We are fully aware that your Organization has accomplished a great deal for humanity and the world of work. In particular, it has succeeded in sowing the seeds of a social conscience in our materialistic world and consolidating the principles, values and foundations that are indispensable for the building of a society based on social justice.

However, we feel at the same time that the Organization's enormous moral weight and heritage leave it with major responsibilities – and likewise its member States – in a modern world faced with problems of unemployment, poverty and social exclusion that are many times more serious than in the wake of the First World War – this at a time of a gradual but general and perceptible curtailment of the role of the State as a model employer and custodian of the nation and its destiny, and of a lowering of the priority given to labour legislation and the fundamental right to work.

Human ingenuity invented the machine and technology to help lighten the burden of labour, increase well-being and make working conditions more humane. But unfortunately the machine has been diverted from its purpose and technology is now jeopardizing people's livelihood and future. Technology has turned structural unemployment into a semi-permanent phenomenon. Indeed it has become a rival and is sometimes viewed as an enemy of employment since it deprives people of jobs or prevents them from keeping those already available. We hear daily of layoffs of thousands of workers, who swell the ranks of the unemployed and of new arrivals in the labour market, of the undermining of social advances and the erosion of workers' purchasing power, problems that stem from the redistribution of world labour, the domination of capitalism and advanced technology, the increased globalization of the economy and the liberalization of international trade, which leave working men and women at the mercy of multilateral corporations and fierce international competition and without adequate social protection.

In our view, the criterion for the future success and enhanced influence and credibility of the ILO does not depend on the drafting of an international labour charter or new simplified and clear labour standards nor does it depend on the number of ratifications of previous or supplementary standards nor on stricter monitoring or supervision of their implementation. Moreover, the development of the ILO should not be measured in terms of the increase in the volume of expenditure on technical cooperation programmes, however essential they may be. The real success or failure of the Organization depends on its success in promoting contacts with member States and helping them to curb unemployment, to alleviate poverty and to widen the basis of popular participation, in other words to ensure the efficient management and full employment of trained human resources. Success further depends on working out solutions, not just one solution but many solutions, to the pervasive problem of unemployment, which has become the greatest concern of all countries without exception.

Although your Organization has successfully passed the test of time in terms of building up experience and know-how, for a 75-year test is a relatively stiff one, we fear that it is in danger of resting on its laurels or becoming self-absorbed, unable to react as required to the upheavals stemming from world change, particularly the globalization of the economy. Unlike in the 1920s, the international scene today is occupied by a plethora of social, economic and humanitarian international organizations and agencies which are competing to be first or alone in putting forward solutions to national and world problems. As a result, the mandate and fields of competence of the ILO, especially in terms of the development of human resources, the fight against unemployment and the promotion of social development, are the subject of an underlying conflict involving existing international organizations, pending the emergence of other organizations to address international trade problems and their social dimensions. We therefore agree with the Director-General when he stresses the need not so much for a special status for the ILO within the United Nations family but for its existing status to be in conformity with its role and its social vision of world problems and their solution. We fully support the principle of complementarity and partnership in work and in international cooperation between bodies having complementary mandates – economic, social, financial and political – since the product of such coordination must of necessity enhance the degree of cooperation and redound to the benefit of all peoples through the reduction in international administrative spending. We also urge that these bridges of cooperation be extended to include regional and national organizations addressing problems of labour and social development in general, since the purpose of regional cooperation is to strengthen the links on which international cooperation depends.

Perhaps one of the objective criticisms that we may level against the line of action and way of thinking of the ILO is its well-nigh absolute theoretical association with a single economic philosophy, its defence of its advantages and its endeavour to persevere in the effort to find solutions to the problems of a particular group of countries to the detriment of the majority. I cite as proof the fact that the main items on the agenda of this session of the Conference are only remotely related to the problems, concerns and needs of the countries of the Third World. Admittedly, safety and health in mines, part-time work and private employment agencies are important subjects, but only for a particular group of countries, which does not include either the developing countries or those with chronic problems in other areas of employment, in particular the informal sector. We urge the organs of the ILO to pay more attention to the social problems of those countries so that appropriate solutions may be found, since the peoples of the countries in question represent the overwhelming majority of the peoples of the world and most of them stand in need of the expertise and assistance of the International Labour Organization.

In conclusion, the Organization must rise to meet the challenges before it and prove at the same time its ability to adapt to events and changes. The World Summit for Social Development, to be held in 1995, will be a new test for the ILO if it wants to retain its position as a world organization catering to the needs of workers and labour, whose primary concern is social justice, labour standards and technical cooperation. The issues raised at the Summit are priorities for the Organization, particularly the question of employment generation which is seen as the instrument for guaranteeing an equitable distribution of resources and establishing peace. The Fourth World Conference on Women: Action for Equality, Development and Peace to be held in Beijing will also provide an opportunity to take stock of the ILO's achievements with regard to respect for the principle of equal opportunities for men and women in employment, at a time of growing unemployment, when women workers are the first to suffer.

Finally, I would like to say how honoured I am to have witnessed the demise of apartheid in South Africa and the establishment of a Government of national unity following the first free and democratic elections to be held there. From this rostrum, I would like to commend the struggle of the South African people and the courage of their President, Mr. Nelson Mandela, and express my hope that they will be able to live in peace, freedom and justice.

Mr. MOORHEAD (Employers' delegate, United States) – On behalf of the United States employers, I would like to offer to the President, our heartiest congratulations upon his election to chair this session of the Conference. His election is recognition of the outstanding contributions he has made to this Organization over the years, and it is a very special feeling to have a fellow citizen in the Chair.

The United States employers commend the Director-General for focusing on the future of the ILO and the need for renewal in his Report. In this connection, we endorse his suggestion to rename the Organization. The International Organization for Employment and Labour will, by its name, bring to the fore an area which we believe has not received enough attention from the ILO – that of job creation.

The most salient and true point made by the Director-General in his Report is that "There can be no doubt that the creation of productive and freely chosen employment is the number one priority of policy-makers in countries throughout the world and must therefore be the central focus of the work of the ILO in the coming years."

In the time allotted, I will touch on three areas: standards; the social clause; and global regulation, and examine how the observations in his Report measure up against this point.

If standard setting is the core of the ILO, as many contend, then any report card reviewing the ILO will have to give it very low marks for relevance. As of 31 December 1993, just six countries (3.5 per cent of the membership) had ratified 50 per cent or more of the Conventions. Of those six, only three had 50 per cent or more in force. More significantly, over two-thirds of the membership of this body have ratified 25 per cent or fewer of the Conventions. Clearly, the standards which are being set at the Conference, or proposed by the Office, are simply not responding to the needs of the world at large.

United States employers share the Director-General's frustration at the attitude certain governments take at the time an instrument is adopted by the Conference and the stance they take when the same instrument comes up for ratification. My own Government, in particular, will vote to adopt a Convention when there is little likelihood that it can be ratified in our country. Perhaps if governments were more realistic at the Conference, fewer Conventions would be adopted and left to languish, and those which we adopt would enjoy a greater rate of ratification.

The Director-General clearly recognizes in his Report that the ILO has difficulty responding to requests for technical assistance given the variety of cultures and different stages of development of the countries concerned. It is curious that he does not recognize that the same problem exists with standards, and the one-size fits all approach which they embody.

Given the appalling rate of ratifications, one must question if the goal of social justice is truly being furthered by standard setting in its present form. Moreover, because of the low rate of ratification, the country that now ratifies a Convention may put its workers and employers at a competitive disadvantage vis-à-vis the majority of countries who do not ratify – an ironic result when one considers that one of the reasons behind the founding of the ILO was to eliminate unfair competition based upon poor working conditions.

By the Director-General's own criteria which I quoted, one would have to ask if all ILO standards have contributed to the creation of productive and freely chosen employment. The United States employers doubt it. Therefore, we propose that the process by which standards are chosen for Conference decision be re-examined by the Governing Body as the Director-General infers in his Report. The United States employers propose that a general discussion on the future of standards policy would be a proper agenda topic for a forthcoming session of the Conference.

There is much discussion about social clauses in the Director-General's Report. It is a popular concept in certain circles today. But this gives priority to form over substance. An emphasis on social clauses is not new. In my own country we enacted in 1930 highly protectionist legislation called the Smoot-Hawley Act. This was followed by an Act that allowed the President to adjust tariffs in order to equalize the differences in the costs of production between a domestic article and a similar article imported from a foreign country. This was called cost equalization and was intended to deal with the problem of low-wage foreign production at a time when labour costs accounted for a high proportion of production costs. Smoot-Hawley had a devastating effect upon the world economy and prolonged the worldwide depression which gripped the world in the 1930s.

How do we define an internationally accepted labour standard? No responsible person can favour exploitation of workers or inhumane working conditions. Yet only one Convention – the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No.29) has been ratified by 75 per cent or more of the member States. In its present form it would be difficult to use as a basis for trade sanctions under a social clause because compliance involves more than complying with the central purpose of the Convention. It includes numerous peripheral details that are not central to the abolition of forced labour, making it difficult to apply in a trade regime. Moreover, if ILO standards are to be enforced by trade sanctions in social clauses, this will change the basic 75-year approach of the ILO to voluntary acceptance of international obligations and undercut and reduce the credibility of the existing supervisory machinery.

Who can argue with freedom of association? However, just as there is a right to organize freely, there is a reciprocal right not to join a labour organization. The central core feature of a democracy is the right to a secret ballot. Employees in my country have the right through a secret ballot to join or not to join a labour organization. Many countries, including some who have advocated the use of worker rights in trade agreements, do not allow workers this right. Are we to discriminate against them because workers are denied one of the inalienable rights of a democracy?

When reduced to its simplest terms, the use of a social clause is simply a protectionist measure under the guise of human rights to be used against somebody we do not like, but only if they are weak enough not to be able to do anything about it. For these reasons, the United States employers reject the attempt to link worker rights with trade sanctions.

Finally, a brief word about global regulation. The Director-General makes one absolutely incredible comment in his Report, and I quote: "It will indeed be difficult to promote social justice if we do not very quickly identify ways and means of regulating the world economy satisfactorily." His theme of regulation comes to the surface when he muses over the "state-centred" nature of ILO standards and would like to see their application applied to "non-governmental actors in the globalization of the economy". And again, when he discusses the forthcoming World Summit for Social Development as providing "an excellent opportunity to develop international mechanisms to ... regulate ... world trends and developments". If he truly believes this, then no lessons have been learned from the collapse of state centrally run economies. Any form of global regulation will stifle growth and strangle job creation. The flexibility to act must be at a local level.

If I may be permitted a personal observation. I am a locally elected official of the town in which I live. I have experienced first-hand what it is like to have mandates imposed locally by state and national government. These are imposed by officials who, like the Director-General, believe in regulation because they think they know better than we do. These officials do not understand, or blatantly ignore, the needs and wishes of the local citizens. At least in this case, we have a ballot to cast to determine our fate. One shudders at the thought of a far-removed bureaucracy doing this at the international level.

There is a revolution under way in the world of work which the Director-General recognizes. There is a universal need for skilled and productive workers who can be called upon to use their individual and collective skills to solve problems and increase productivity. This will require greater democracy in the workplace and the ability of each enterprise to adapt its organization to competitive needs and reality.

The ILO cannot stop this revolution. It can, however, influence the direction and scope of it. Through technical assistance and tripartite consultations, the ILO can help employers and workers cope with the disruptions created by company restructuring and the globalization of the economy. Instead of a mindless concentration on new standards, social clauses and global regulation, we should be using the strength of the ILO – its tripartite nature – to focus upon and come to grips with these problems.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Mr. BERGE (Minister of local Government and Labour, Norway) – I am honoured to once again have the opportunity to address the International Labour Conference and I would like to congratulate Mr. Gray on his election to the important position of President of the Conference.

It is a special pleasure for Norway to welcome the Republic of South Africa back to the ILO. We look forward to close and fruitful cooperation with the new Government of South Africa. The international community has a responsibility to assist in the consolidation of this new democracy.

The peace process in the Middle East – in which Norway has been actively engaged – must also be supported. The economic stabilization of Palestinian autonomy and the region in general will be crucial. This cannot be achieved without outside assistance. We must now adjust the work of the ILO to reflect the positive changes in these two areas.

The ILO is this year celebrating its 75th anniversary. It is 50 years since the ILO signed the Declaration of Philadelphia. During these years, the ILO has been working steadily to expand the protection of fundamental human rights and the protection of workers.

On this anniversary, we must focus on how the ILO can best meet the challenges facing the international community in the years to come, and I think the Director-General's Report will serve as an excellent basis for our discussions on this issue.

As reflected in the Report of the Director-General, we are living in an age of dynamic international change. Old conflicts are reaching their end-game, while new tragedies are unfolding in former Yugoslavia and in Africa.

But global change is not limited to the political arena. Above and beyond politics, the globalization of the world economy continues at accelerating speed, now spurred by the successful outcome of the Uruguay Round.

The global market-place needs rules and regulations to function properly. I fully agree with the Director-General that it would be difficult at the International level to find anything to rival the International Labour Code, developed by the ILO over its 75-year life span. But the question is whether this Code, which sovereign States have to ratify and apply, is sufficiently suited to present-day realities. The Code, which covers the whole field of standard setting will have to make a distinction between what is necessary, what is useful and what is transitory, as the Director-General rightly points out.

The adoption of well-conceived employment strategies, based on a sound knowledge of the national economic and labour market situation, is essential. For the ILO this involves helping member States to formulate and implement comprehensive employment and development strategies.

Structural reform to increase employment and improve the functioning of the labour market should not be viewed in isolation. The implementation of structural reform calls for close cooperation with the social partners in order to find socially acceptable solutions.

I would also like to comment on the issue of standard setting. The five Nordic Governments submitted a memorandum focusing on the future of the ILO to the Director-General in December 1993. We proposed that, during the rest of the nineties, the ILO should be more restrictive in its consideration of new instruments. Instead, the ILO should consider revising older Conventions more often. We should aim to give the Conventions a form which better reflects the challenges of today and tomorrow. We should consider removing some of the present obstacles to more widespread ratification. Our objective should be to elaborate Conventions which a majority of member States can ratify, without taking away their basic substance.

We believe that the ILO's supervisory system should be thoroughly evaluated. It is a paradox that so many organizational resources are used on supervising the few governments who have ratified a large number of Conventions, while so little is done to focus on the situation of the workers in the majority of member States who have ratified only very few of them. The ILO should give priority to general surveys on the Conventions on basic workers' rights in order to investigate more frequently working conditions in countries which have not even ratified these Conventions.

In a period of zero growth in the ordinary budget the ILO must establish clear priorities. In my opinion, there are four main problems that should be given the highest priority of the ILO. The first is obstructions to the right to organize free trade unions, the second is child labour, the third is forced labour, the fourth is discrimination in employment due to race or sex.

This does not mean that the other problems of working life should be left unattended. The fight against unemployment is a number one political priority for many governments, including my own. But if we cannot secure the workers of this world at least the most basic workers' rights, we will not be able to solve the problems of unemployment. We want work for all people, but we want them to have decent jobs, not forced labour or jobs where they are seriously abused.

The issue of social clauses has become an important one at this Conference. We can see a growing wish to include in international trade agreements conditions that call for the elimination of exploitation and violations against basic human rights.

I know that many of the developing countries are very much against discussing this issue at all as they believe that it could become an alibi for raising protectionist trade barriers. To some extent, I can understand these worries. On the other hand, it should not be possible for the international community to completely disregard situations where goods and services are produced under conditions where workers are abused and exploited. Studies on the link between the trading system and international labour standards are under way at the OECD.

If we want to promote decent working conditions in a country, the right to organize free trade unions and employers' organizations and the right to collective bargaining remain essential. As the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations mentions in this year's report, the application of the Conventions on freedom of association cannot be made contingent upon the level of economic development of a country because these are instruments which involve basic human rights.

In conclusion, I fully agree with the Director-General that there are no simple answers to the issue of social clauses. But the ILO cannot turn its back on this problem. I will urge the Governing Body and the Director-General to develop further a comprehensive approach for the ILO on this matter. This approach should include complementary measures that would facilitate the necessary adjustments in the countries concerned. The developing countries especially will need substantial practical support from the ILO whenever social clauses are introduced.

Mr. HERMINIE – (Government delegate, Seychelles) – It is a great pleasure and privilege for me to address this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference as leader of the delegation from the Republic of Seychelles.

First, I would like to join my colleagues in congratulating the Director-General, Mr. Hansenne, for his well-thought and forward-looking Report. He has identified the subjects of the Report with a skill that vouches for the kind of vision the ILO and the world needs right now. I shall return to his Report later.

I now wish to say a few words about my country. The Republic of Seychelles consists of 115 islands and has a small territory with a total land area of 445 square kilometres. The main island, Mahe, accounts for 50 per cent of this land area. We are a nation of 72,000 people, of which 90 per cent are concentrated on the main island. The labour force is made up of 25,000 people employed in a fairly large public service, fisheries, tourism and other service industries. There are no natural resources such as oil or minerals. However, we have a tropical climate, sandy beaches, nice people and we welcome visitors to our beautiful shores.

As you will have noticed, Seychelles is tiny in many respects. As a sovereign State, we have to be able to organize our Government and country as other bigger countries do.

The information I have given will enable you to put in perspective my observations and comments on the Director-General's Report.

Day by day, the world is becoming smaller and smaller. This means that global economic and social developments affect all of us at national level. The Director-General in his Report urges us to forget our national problems, at least for a moment, and see the world as our home. From the perspective of Seychelles, I can only commend him for his vision.

We too are preoccupied with our own hardships but also have come to recognize that solving our problems requires the cooperation of our brothers and sisters in the rest of the world. No country can operate in isolation now that there exist worldwide trade agreements and financial markets.

I now turn to the Director-General's observation that social and economic development must be linked more closely at the international level. As in so many other issues, the international community has compartmentalized economic development plans and social development plans, to such an extent that we have often landed in disasters in one area if we have succeeded in the other. It is only a balanced pursuit of both goals that can bring prosperity and remedy the causes of poverty so much in evidence in the developing countries, but more recently, also in the developed countries. Whilst I am proud to report that poverty, in terms of hunger, lack of education, and health service is non-existent in Seychelles, we do have unemployment, especially among unskilled women and youth.

We therefore support the Director-General's proposals that all institutions and organizations which are looking for answers and solutions to the different problems of the world today, should get together. They should realistically analyse the situation and seek solutions which will guarantee social justice to all, along with the benefits of economic development.

Let us not forget, on this 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia, some of the early statements which have come to symbolize the very existence of the ILO. I quote "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

Similarly, the preamble of the ILO's Constitution says it all in its declaration, "universal and lasting peace can be founded only on the basis of social justice".

As many speakers before me, I would like to recall here that the ILO, with its 75 years of experience, is in a pivotal position to help coordinate efforts towards the better world of tomorrow. The tripartite nature of the ILO further strengthens its unique position as a representative of all social partners. The initiatives the Director-General has taken in preparation of the World Summit for Social Development, to be held in Copenhagen next year, already point towards the natural process for the ILO to assume a more prominent role in world affairs.

As a priority issue, I have spoken in support of the new prominence of the ILO in the area of policy making for the economic and social development of the world.

I would now like to say a few words about the Director-General's Report, and specifically on the subject of standard setting.

The Republic of Seychelles has ratified 19 Conventions so far and we are in the process of considering ratification of others. It has become clear to us, however, that there is a need for the ILO to review the labour standards prescribed by the older Conventions. This exercise will enable the updating of some and perhaps result in completely discarding others, as all this will help to make those Conventions that are retained more adapted to today's realities.

I also wish to indicate our support of the proposal of the Director-General that labour standards in the future should define the general framework, rather than establish a rigid detailed standard. This approach will, in our view, facilitate the adaptation of the ILO standards in the national context of member States. The flexibility the approach promotes, must always ensure that the fundamental principles provided by the standards are respected.

In introducing new labour standards, we recommend that subjects are chosen with extreme care, from top priority areas only. It is quality rather than quantity that the ILO standards must aim at.

I now turn to the ILO's role as an organization at the service of its constituents.

The ILO, particularly for a small country like ours, represents a major source of information, technical assistance and training opportunities in specialized areas. Due to our smallness and lack of resources, we are in need of assistance. In the case of Seychelles, we look forward to ILO support in the development of industrial relations, and the review of the labour market information systems.

More and more, we also appreciate the opportunities the ILO provides for debate and exchange of experiences among members.

This is also an area where our country envisages participating more actively in the future.

In conclusion, I would like to pledge the support of the Republic of Seychelles to the ILO's efforts in reviewing its role and activities for the betterment of the world for all of us. We have all witnessed the often drastic effects of structural adjustment programmes, especially in Africa. Was it really not possible to soften the blow dealt to so many families whose breadwinner lost his or her job? Would the decision-makers have benefited from the advice of ILO? We, the members, look to the ILO as our spokesperson in international forums where issues of economic development tend to overshadow those of social justice. After all, we know by now that there cannot be one without the other.

You may have noticed that in the last few years my country has not been too active in ILO activities. We have, however, followed closely the good work of the Organization, from which, as a country, we have benefitted. You can rest assured that my country remains committed to the cause of the ILO. In future we promise to play our role more actively.

In Seychelles we are confident that, under the able leadership of the Governing Body and the Director-General, the ILO will forge ahead for a better world for us all. Last but not least, happy birthday ILO.

Mrs. PEDERSON (Workers' delegate, Norway) – Allow me on behalf of the Norwegian Confederation of Trade Unions to congratulate the President on his election to chair this year's session of the Conference, and I would also like to congratulate and welcome the new member States of the ILO, especially South Africa.

The Report of the Director-General in this year of the ILO's 75th anniversary is useful. I would like to comment on some of the topics it deals with.

The ILO was founded shortly after the First World War, and at the end of the Second World War the Declaration of Philadelphia was adopted.

Although much has changed, and the world of labour finds itself in a constant state of flux, the challenges remain the same today as in 1919 in large parts of the world.

Now, as then, we find ourselves confronted with unemployment, social injustice, poverty, a detrimental and hazardous working environment, discrimination, forced labour, child labour and the violation of human rights, trade union rights included.

Such conditions create uncertainty, despair and social unrest, conditions which may lead to serious conflicts.

We can contribute to preventing such conflicts by following up the mandate of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The most important tools of the ILO are its labour standards and their implementation in the member States.

From the side of the employers and from several governments, there are suggestions that the number of new standards be limited and older ones be revised. There are also opinions in favour of more general and less detailed standards. It is claimed that too few countries will be able to ratify standards with their actual form and content.

I wonder whether the same employers and governments have considered the fact that if most countries would find it possible to ratify standards without problems, then the standards would probably have so little substance that they would be of little use or guidance to those needing them.

I would like to point out the emphasis placed by the Director-General in his Report on standards as a point of reference. As he says, "standards have been widely used in policy debates, in framing legislation and in collective bargaining". This means that the standards have been of much greater importance than the number of ratifications would indicate.

Rich countries and employers' organizations in rich countries take on a huge responsibility if they do not ratify standards or try to prevent ratification, and at the same time use non-ratification as an argument to justify a limitation in the number of new standards and a weakening of the form and content in the elaboration of new and in the revision of older standards.

It is the task and responsibility of rich countries to contribute, inter alia, through the ILO to development in other parts of the world, both with regard to the labour rights situation and in the social and financial context. Support to and participation in technical cooperation is important to develop tripartism wherever such mechanisms do not exist. A point of prime importance here is to support the development of representative and competent organizations of workers and employers with a view to their active participation in negotiations, and the establishment of binding agreements, and the elaboration of systems and legislation in accordance with the requirements of the ILO.

To support positive developments, the ILO must exert pressure on international institutions like the IMF, the World Bank and the World Trade Organization, to ensure that they actively avoid negative consequences in their work. So far, structural adjustment programmes have been synonymous with, inter alia, cuts in public expenditure, leading to unemployment and a reduction in welfare for the public in general. This is a dangerous development. The importance of introducing a social clause in international trade must be underlined at the establishment of the World Trade Organization. This means requirements for the abolition of child labour, forced labour and discrimination, and requirements on the respect for human rights, trade union rights included, and the right for free negotiations. The same initiatives must be advocated by the ILO at the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen in 1995.

The very special construction and role of the ILO is of paramount importance. No other system or organization has the same inherent possibility to create understanding and cooperation between groups that are traditionally counterparts, and across national borders. There is no other system offering such possibilities for the development of instruments to be used actively and on a permanent basis, and so close to those they are intended to serve.

The parties attending the Conference come from the most representative organizations of the various countries. It is important that the ILO should not be weakened by way of representations by interest groups other than today's parties, as the Director-General indicates in his Report.

Summing up, the ILO must preserve and continue its highly valued work on the development of new standards. The ILO must press for standards to be ratified. In the case of the non-ratification of standards, pressure must be exerted to steer development in the right direction for countries to be able to ratify them. The ILO must influence the IMF, the World Bank and the World Trade Organization with a view to having a social clause incorporated in the mandate and the work of the above organizations. Technical cooperation must be used actively to develop tripartism in all ILO member States.

The work of the ILO has not been completed. The mandate of the ILO is as relevant as ever. We do not need, and we cannot afford, a Third World War to document those needs. The challenges are many. It is our responsibility to carry on the work of the ILO for human rights, social justice and peace.

Original Spanish: Mr. ZAVALA-COSTA (Employers' delegate, Peru) – It is an honour for me once again to address this assembly this year, 1994, in which we are celebrating the 75th anniversary of the establishment of our Organization, and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. On behalf of the employers of Peru, we would like to say how happy we are to see the end of apartheid in South Africa and greet its President, Nelson Mandela. We consider this a victory for justice, peace and human dignity.

In the Report of the Director-General this year, a whole series of fundamentally important questions are raised, all of them linked to the rapid changes the world has experienced in the past few years. As he says in his introduction, the creation of the ILO was closely linked to the birth of Communism in Russia, which had an enormous influence on our Organization, and its principles and achievements at the outset. With the fall of Communism whose fate was sealed by the fall of the Berlin Wall, and the end of the Cold War between the East and the West, the world has made a great turnabout, and this has led to a decisive shift in the life of our Organization. The triumph of the market economy which amounts to no less than the success of liberal ideologies as practically the only option open to governments forces our Organization to reassess its goals and purposes on an immediate and long-term basis. The changes in the world impel the Organization to adapt to the new requirements of the international community or else lose its relevance.

We share the views of the Director-General in the conclusion of his Report that the basic aims of the ILO are to improve working conditions, by combating any remaining form of exploitation. But we believe that the development of economies and the ever greater integration of countries has led to the appearance of new problems merit the special attention of our Organization.

As it says in the Report, it is not a question of establishing norms left, right and centre, according to present conditions, nor should we suspend the standard-setting activities of our Organization. Instead we should spend time on analysing the present implementation of a whole series of Conventions and Recommendations, in the light of the development of nations and economic trends. To deny the importance of these elements would be absurd and, in the future, would no doubt mean a failure to implement the standards assumed by the member States and a reluctance to adopt new commitments.

Indeed, we must ensure the relevance of the actions of our Organization bearing in mind the new trends of the world economy. The change towards a market economy and private enterprise, the liberalization of trade, the growing importance of transnational enterprises, international capital movements and the increased participation of foreign investments have all contributed to the globalization of the economy. Nobody in this auditorium can fail to recognize that the support of international economic bodies is conditional on a range of amendments being made to countries' internal policies. One such condition is that we ensure flexibility in the labour market, which would, for example, mean the elimination of certain customs barriers, or allow greater mobility of workers.

The Director-General of the ILO raises the question of whether, in the face of the globalization of the economy, we should provide for regulatory mechanisms at the international level. He says that "the ILO cannot afford to remain on the sidelines of this debate as it clearly has a regulatory vocation. It would be difficult at the international level to find anything to rival the International Labour Code that the ILO has developed over its 75-year lifespan. But the question is whether this Code, which the sovereign States have to ratify and apply, is well suited to present-day realities".

We agree with the task suggested by the Director-General, namely to reassess the achievements of the ILO and decide on the future thrust of its activities. The time has come to slow down the pace with which we establish new labour instruments and make it our priority to consolidate, review and improve the important standard-setting activities of the ILO.

We think the ILO can acquit itself well, in terms of these requirements regarding the role and content of standards but only if it works on the premise that if at the international level flexibility is preferred, our Organization should follow suit and take stock of which of its Conventions are too rigid for present times. We should consider international legislation in the light of the various needs of ILO's member States and try to find minimum common standards which do should not hamper but stimulate economic growth and development.

This realistic revision of ILO standards will improve the rate of ratification (which has not happened in the last few years) and greater compliance with the standards already ratified. We must bear in mind that the ideological and economic conditions of most member States at the time of ratification of certain Conventions has now radically changed. Thus, it is necessary to adapt these standards or withdraw them, with the consequent estrangement of certain States. The international legislative framework cannot act as a straitjacket hampering States' economic development. It would be a shame if the efforts made by the Organization over 75 years should be wasted because of a failure to adapt to a changing world.

In economically backward countries, such as Peru, this is very important. In the last three years we have made significant changes to our economic policy. From a populist approach with a paternalistic welfare State we have adapted to a more liberal approach, reducing the State apparatus, and stimulating and guaranteeing free enterprise, where national and foreign investments are subject to the same conditions. This has gone hand-in-hand with a serious effort to become part, once again, of the international economic community, with all the regrettable costs this entails for society. Thus, in Peru which is streamlining its economy, weakening the State apparatus through privatization programmes, opening up its markets to foreign investment, this has entailed enormous social costs which should be tackled, as a priority by the Government. This can be seen through the high levels of unemployment and underemployment which alongside the fall in wages and an increased tax burden very often lead to non-productive technical taxes, such as the tax on assets, and have raised the spectre of recession in many sectors of our economy. The adoption of clear labour standards and regulations and a policy to provide and "formalize" employment make up the essential legal framework to reactivate the Peruvian economy.

On the other hand, with respect to ILO technical cooperation, the difficulty of relying on common standards to be applied by all the member States of the Organization requires in the next few years that the Organization should go beyond a purely legislative role and act in an advisory capacity. In other words deregulation of labour legislation at the international level requires from the ILO greater technical cooperation in drawing up the internal labour legislation of member States and in improving their administrative practices, pursuant to article 10(2) of the Constitution of the ILO, 1919.

It is true that this direct cooperation between the ILO and States is, in principle, a difficult and complex task. However, we believe that at the present time it is the most efficient way to make tangible legislative progress such as upholding minimum standards regulating employment relationships. But, at the same time, we must prevent this technical cooperation from being used as a means of pressure by the Organization to ratify given Conventions because this would distort our task.

Although the Report of the Director-General is entitled Defending values, promoting change, it is essential that we reassess the role of private enterprises in economies where the State is relinquishing participation. Essentially, it is a question of ensuring favourable conditions for an active policy to foster full, productive and freely chosen employment. Here we need to support small and medium-sized enterprises to trigger employment generation. The ILO instruments should not, above all, slow down economic growth and the competitiveness of enterprises. This is a prerequisite for the success of any social policy, and particularly the creation of much needed employment. Economic growth without employment generation would lead, in the medium term, to an inevitable fall in the standard of living of the workers. Private enterprise, therefore, is the great instrument of change.

Finally, we wish to express our belief that the work and credibility of the ILO can and must emerge successful and stronger from these changes and, by way of support for the points made by the Director-General, we would like to recall that the 75th anniversary of the Organization gives us, the international community, an opportunity to reaffirm "its belief in social justice as one of its fundamental values and its determination to further this cause; its confidence in active tripartism as a motivating force; its determination to adapt the Organization and its secretariat to the tasks that lie ahead".

Mr. BARAK (Government delegate, Israel) – It is quite appropriate that, on the occasion of the 75th anniversary of the ILO, the Director-General has chosen to present us with a report aimed at reviewing the role, functions and agenda of the ILO in the forthcoming decade.

The Report covers a wide range of issues facing the Organization today, as a result of vast global economic and political changes, and provides us with an extensive, in-depth and relevant analysis of what our goals should be and how we can achieve them.

Although the Report tries to cast some doubts on old beliefs, it adheres essentially to the traditional values of our Organization: seeking social justice, promoting social dialogue and preserving the standard-setting process together with its supervisory mechanisms.

While endorsing all these principles, I would like to comment in more detail on some aspects of the Report.

Many views have been expressed concerning the ILO's standard-setting activities. Some suggest the division of the Conventions into different categories of importance, such as Conventions guaranteeing basic human rights vis-à-vis other less important Conventions, which might be turned, perhaps, into Recommendations or codes of practice. Others regard the normative work of the Organization as an important safeguard against the harmful effects on workers' rights which sometimes result from the excessive deregulation and flexibility exercised in some economic systems. While it is true, as the Director-General indicated, that some adaptations should be made in view of the global realities, we feel that the standard-setting efforts of the ILO should continue to be the basic means for promoting progress.

The value and influence of the ILO's standard-setting work should be assessed not merely by the number of ratifications – although this aspect is important in itself – but also by the effectiveness of its supervisory machinery, to which we attach great value. As an example, in Israel just recently a parliamentary committee in the Knesset, while preparing a Bill touching on trade union autonomy, took into consideration in its debate the views of the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association, as reflected in some of its past decisions on analogous matters, so as to bring the Bill more into line with ILO standards.

There is no real contradiction between the support of ILO legislative functions and the examination of standards with a view to revising and updating Conventions and testing their effectiveness.

This examination should take into account, on the one hand, the need for more flexibility in order to combat unemployment, and, on the other hand, our moral and indeed legal obligations, according to the spirit and the letter of the principles on which our Constitution is based, to promote social justice.

Is it possible to keep this delicate balance between these seemingly conflicting factors? The solution to this dilemma is by no means simple and easy, but it is possible, as can be illustrated by our experience in Israel.

From 1959, when our State Employment Service was established, the operation of private fee-charging employment agencies was practically impossible. That was the situation until 1991, when it was argued that private employment agencies might have an important role in the national effort to combat unemployment. A bill was therefore introduced in the Knesset, our Parliament, to amend the law so that the operation of fee-charging private employment agencies would be lawful, subject, however, to strict licensing and supervisory conditions, as required by the provisions of Convention No. 96, which Israel had already ratified in 1961, accepting the provisions of Part II of the Convention.

At that point, many objections were raised against the proposed law, to the effect that the restrictions imposed on private employment agencies actually impaired their ability to function in the labour market.

In order to expedite the legislation, a compromise was accepted, whereby the law would be based on the following principles: first, the State Employment Service retained its exclusive authority as regards the implementation of the unemployment insurance law; second, a distinction was made between employment agencies acting as labour brokers and labour contractors, who were exempted from the provisions of the law; third, private employment agencies were absolutely prohibited from collecting fees, expenses, etc. from the workers who used their services; and fourth, private employment agencies were obliged to refrain from any discrimination whatsoever against jobseekers who applied for their services as regards job placement.

The law then enacted turned out to be a success in terms of the increasing size and the importance of private employment agencies in the labour market. One hundred and sixty-six private employment agencies have been registered and licensed since the enactment of the law, which is a notable number for a small country like Israel.

On the other hand, some 210 labour contractors, employing approximately 60,000-100,000 workers, who account for nearly 6 per cent of all Israeli employees, also operate without the obligation to register and obtain a licence.

The added value of this type of operation in the labour market was drawn from several factors. Private employment agencies proved to be more efficient than the public employment service when a quick response to changes in the labour market was essential. They developed advanced methods for more adequate utilization of labour, enabling a better match between supply and demand, and they helped new entrants to the labour force to get employment or to be gradually incorporated into permanent employment.

On the other hand, since the enactment of the new law in 1991, problems have begun to appear, mainly in relation to the misconduct of some labour contractors concerning workers' rights. It seemed that in some workplaces workers who were employed by labour contractors were discriminated against in terms of wages and other benefits, as compared with the regular workers employed in the same workplace.

In view of increasing complaints of poor practices concerning workers' rights, an amendment was proposed, in order to bring labour contractors within the purview of the licensing and supervisory machinery which already applied to private employment agencies operating as labour brokers. Another amendment was proposed to equate the rights of workers employed by labour contractors and those of regular workers employed at the same enterprise.

In response to these proposed amendments, the advocates of deregulation and flexibility protested again, as a result of which the proposed legislation was temporarily suspended, pending discussions between the interested parties as to the best manner of resolving the problem.

Meanwhile, a breakthrough has occurred which may indicate the way to a proper solution of the problem. The Histadrut has signed a collective agreement with a firm employing, as a labour contractor, the largest number of workers in Israel, providing adequate wages and other benefits to these workers.

At present, another labour contracting firm employing a large number of workers has expressed its willingness to enter negotiations with the Histadrut for the purpose of drawing up a collective agreement.

We hope that these positive developments will pave the way for the settlement of this problem, and we are already considering ways and means by which the Government can and should prompt other labour contractors to join the collective bargaining process.

The conclusions to be drawn from the Israeli experience are that, with the cooperation of all the social partners – Government, employers and workers – labour standards can be maintained and even strengthened for the benefit of the workers and of society as a whole. At the same time, we cannot be content with past achievements. Labour standards must be continually examined in order to take into account social and technical developments. In doing so, the views of all the social partners must be fully reflected in order to preserve a broad consensus. This is what tripartism is all about. The Israeli experience just described, shows how this can be achieved.

Mr. ZELLHOEFER (Workers' adviser, United States) – I would like first of all to congratulate Brother Gray on his election to the presidency of this, the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. It is an honour well deserved by him for his thoughtful and dedicated contributions over many years to past conferences and, in recent years, the articulate and active role he has played as a member of the Governing Body. It is also a most timely and well deserved honour for the Workers' group who represent the millions of workers around the world on this, the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

There is an advantage to being able to speak in the latter part of the Conference schedule. It can give one the opportunity either to listen to or read the interventions of nearly all those who have come before. In reading through so many of the speeches given in the last several days here, I was struck by the communality and clearness of so many of the workers' representatives' speeches as well as others, that this year, on this anniversary, the ILO has an unquestionable choice to make.

It must not back away from its mandate. That mandate is social justice. The ILO's unique standard-setting, supervisory machinery – technical expertise, indeed its full competence and authority – must be reinforced and strengthened. At a time when the world is about to embark with a new framework to expand global trade, the ILO should be gearing up to meet the challenge to ensure the benefits of greater global economic integration are shared fairly by everyone. It is after all the value of human dignity that is at stake.

Seventy-five years ago the ILO was founded after what had just been the most devastating war in known history. The ILO's Constitution and its unique tripartite structure made it the first organization to forge a genuine social pact at the international level. Tragically, the Second World War, with its unspeakable atrocities, brought the progress that had been made to a halt. Yet, as the Secretary-General of the United Nations Organization reminded us in his address here a few days ago, there occurred an unprecedented process of rethinking in the social sphere, resulting in the Declaration of Philadelphia in 1944. That Declaration, and I quote Mr. Boutros Boutros-Ghali "is remarkable both for the broad sweep of its views and for its surprising modernity. In every line of that text, the objective of social justice is affirmed". In addition, the Secretary-General highlighted the Declaration's underscoring of the primacy of the social sphere, the links between peace and development, and the danger that poverty constituted to prosperity.

That Declaration should do more than guide our actions in terms of principles and ethics on this dual anniversary. It should inspire this Organization, the International Labour Organization, to redouble its efforts and reinforce its resolve to underpin the development of democracy and democratic institutions to achieve genuine peace and security and to ensure sustainable global development through the principles and practice of solidarity and social justice.

Now, 25 years later, after the 50th anniversary of the ILO in 1969, we can see for the most part the end of the Cold War. Very recent events in North Korea serve to remind us that the Cold War had some very violent periods. Decades of struggle to bring down the totalitarian regimes in the former Eastern Bloc, often led by the independent trade union movements and at considerable cost, were finally successful only just a few years ago. The Polish Solidarnosc Workers' adviser's speech here a few days ago made a clear point when he said the communist system became bankrupt not because of economic failure but rather because of its moral bankruptcy which generated an inevitable economic crisis. One of the primary challenges facing the ILO in this new era is to ensure that a comprehensive social dimension is a tangible and integrated component in the reform process in Central and Eastern Europe and the newly independent States.

It is plainly apparent that one of the other overriding challenges facing the ILO as it approaches the next century is the increase in both global economic integration and poverty. The Director-General's Report and numerous speeches before my own have cited the appalling statistics of unemployment, underemployment, marginalization, child labour, discrimination, rising poverty and starvation. Competition within and between nations for liberalized foreign direct investment flows has intensified and the influence of multinational corporations to move resources around the globe and play a major role in determining the policies of national governments and international institutions continue to be some of the salient features of the global economic and social landscape, and I would like to add that soft or flexible Conventions won't fix these problems. Attacks on trade unions in nearly all parts of the world are on the increase. It is not surprising to note that the more authoritarian the regime, the more violent the attack.

Rising unemployment and poverty in the developing countries, coupled with its re-emergence in the industrialized countries, represent nothing short of a social time bomb. Rising income gaps, social and economic marginalization and isolation can lead to the belief that the "law of the jungle" is in fact re-emerging. Social Darwinism seems to be the foundation of the altar at which the hard-core free-market ideologues preach. It is a path on which the elite and their apparatchiks and supplicants would lead the world into a downward spiral marked by greater violence, xenophobia and fanatic extremism.

The shock therapy, deregulatory, social – protection-slashing policies of the IMF and the World Bank have not and will not work. As the US Secretary of Labor observed at the recent informal Tripartite Meeting on Employment, rarely in international discourse has the word "flexibility" gone so directly from obscurity to meaninglessness without any intervening period of coherence.

The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions has long maintained that sustainable global growth through increased non-inflationary demand in both developing and industrialized countries in parallel with rising standards of living for the world's population is achievable. The ICFTU's articulation for a global social clause is not new; it has in fact been around for some time. Now that the Uruguay Round of GATT negotiations have been completed and the preparations are under way for the formation of a larger and potentially more effective World Trade Organization, a lot more attention is being given to the idea of a social clause.

Unfortunately, there also seem to have been some misunderstandings and misinformation generated about what is meant by a social clause and whether and how the ILO may play a role. I must repeat what the many Workers' delegates and others who have preceded me at this Conference have underscored, that a social clause is neither protectionism nor "cultural imperialism".

In order to meet the challenge to live up to the Declaration of Philadelphia and move forward within its mandate, the ILO must ask itself how it can ensure that ILO Conventions covering fundamental rights – including freedom of association, organization and collective bargaining, equality of opportunity and freedom from force and child labour – are used effectively to promote the fair distribution of the benefits of expanding world trade and global economic integration. The creation of the World Trade Organization and the cooperation of the ILO – through its unique competence, authority and tripartite structure – to ensure a clear linkage of social justice with economic growth, is indeed the next challenge before us all.

Original German: Mr. NEUGEBAUER (Workers' adviser, Austria) – In his Report, Defending values, promoting change, the Director-General has devoted a section to "a changing world" in which he is sceptical on a number of points. Inter alia, he asks the following questions: By promoting social justice, can the International Labour Organization continue to contribute to world peace in the future? Is the ILO's tripartite approach still relevant in today's political, economic and social context? Are trade unions also suffering from a loss of credibility?

The main argument given for these uncertainties is that the "bipolar" world has come to an end. Without any doubt, the demise of communism has led to a change in economic conditions, but it has also brought about a new style of discussion between blocs that used to be enemies; and this has also had an impact on the climate of dialogue in the International Labour Organization.

There are, however, still many contradictions. In many regions of this world, there are frightening levels of child labour encouraged by adults. Thirty-two wars are being waged on our planet as I speak – wars that are costing thousands of people their lives. And who is actually taking any energetic action to halt this? Who is really bothered by the North-South divide and the enormous gap between poor and rich? This list of contradictions can be extended ad infinitum.

For peaceful coexistence, it is necessary to ensure that the social dimension is not neglected, particularly today when the spotlights are on the market and its modern mechanisms. A renewed interest in the social market economy – with an emphasis on the need to care for the environment and maintain an ecologically and socially responsible approach – constitutes, in my opinion, the basis for an economically sound society and peaceful coexistence. If we adopt this standpoint, it is vital that the major actors in society, i.e. representatives of governments, workers and employees, still continue to meet and sit down around a table together to discuss their problems.

In Austria, the system of social partnership has truly proved its worth. It provides an opportunity to resolve social and economic issues in the lobby before they come up for debate in Parliament.

The Austrian Confederation of Trade Unions plays a major role in all of this. It is strong and effective not only because it has a large number of members at grass-roots level, but also because since the end of the Second World War, it has become a well-established tradition for trade union leaders to be actively involved in political parties and in Parliament and governments. Consequently, during the past 50 years, we have taken it for granted that the Federal Minister of Labour and Social Affairs comes from the ranks of the Austrian trade union movement. Indeed, this minister is nominated by that movement and, for the record, I should like to recall that our present Minister of Labour and Social Affairs is also the Chairman of the Building and Woodworkers' Union; he addressed this assembly yesterday.

I therefore view new developments not so much as being a threat as a challenge. In an ecologically and socially responsible market economy, in which governments, workers and employers are fully integrated as partners on an equal footing, we must strive for full employment and social justice. This will remain a concern of and task for the ILO in the future.

Last week the OECD published a comprehensive study which included ideas on a new social policy for the industrialized nations. According to this study, we must dismantle obstacles on the path to a revived labour market, but we must also uphold the level of social protection that every society would like to offer to its citizens. In order to achieve that goal, we must take a series of measures such as: more flexible working time, better further training opportunities and the promotion of innovative technologies.

Unemployment is the first step down the slippery slope towards a disintegration of society. The next is the loss of credibility of the democratic system. Whoever see this danger understands the need for the International Labour Organization.

The World Summit for Social Development, to be held in Copenhagen in 1995, again offers the International Labour Organization a magnificent opportunity to put its intrinsic potential to successful and productive use.

Original Spanish: Mr. GRIÑAN MARTINEZ (Minister for Labour and Social Security, Spain) – May I be allowed first of all to congratulate the President on his unanimous election to guide the work of this session of the Conference, a job, I may add, that he is doing very well and very fairly.

The excellent Report of the Director-General presents the problems of our times in a skilful manner. As we say in our country, it has taken the bull by the horns, describing with accuracy the crucial stage at which the International Labour Organization now finds itself. This time, the Organization must face not only a new world, but one that is changing as well. We therefore must urgently adapt the structure, functions and operational methods of the ILO, to enable it to continue playing its important role.

Historically, the various period and stages of the ILO's experience have reflected the development of the world's economic and political conditions. It could not have been otherwise. At the present time, after the disappearance of the bipolar mentality of bloc politics, we now see a universal acceptance of the market economy. This has led to new and complex problems. It brings with it the need to find new ways to ensure that the rights of workers are respected and social protection systems are implemented in practice. It is, in particular, necessary to find ways and means to overcome the lack of minimum social guarantees which has appeared as the markets have opened. Minimum levels must be found which, while respecting the development conditions of the least advanced countries, will ensure that they make progress on the road of freedom and solidarity.

The analysis of the changes brought about by the globalization of the economy or by technological developments should concentrate on the question of how these changes affect working conditions and, particularly, how they influence possibilities of maintaining existing employment and of creating new jobs.

This requires a reassessment of the role which labour laws have played in fostering the creation of jobs. If we are going to discuss the globalized economy and its effects on labour relations, then we must necessarily also discuss the role of the only international organization which is specialized in this field.

Labour standard setting must change so that it can serve as a basis from which to facilitate economic growth which generates employment and, above all, to ensure that competitiveness and social progress are compatible. It is precisely in order to preserve the values which have been protected by labour legislation in general and by ILO Conventions in particular that we must examine, as the Director-General has done very lucidly in his Report, these economic changes which influence employment and working conditions. We also must consider the way in which labour laws should react to these changes.

This has been one of the priorities of the Spanish Government in this last year. It launched a reform of the labour market, inspired by the first line of the White Paper of the European Commission: "The one and only reason is unemployment". In order to combat it, we have based our work on two principles. First of all, to affirm that economic growth on its own is not sufficient, and that it is thus necessary to make growth serve the purpose of creating jobs and, secondly, to defend the importance of the social order in the process of creating jobs. The role and functioning of the labour market must also take into account this objective.

We would like once and for all to make economic growth and the legal order into tools for the promotion of the commodity our society most cherishes: work. If they serve this purpose, they must in any case always respect basic rights, such as the right of trade unions, freedom of association, the right of collective bargaining, the right to strike and the right to social protection.

The reform of Spanish labour legislation was the subject of negotiations between the social partners from 27 July to 30 November 1993. It was not possible to reach an agreement after 33 meetings. The matter was brought before Parliament on 28 December and, after the parliamentary procedures were completed and with the broad support of the Houses, the law was passed on 23 May.

The first effects of the reform have shown that those who defended the idea that the sole objective of the reform was to "promote job creation and maintain existing employment" were quite right. What is more, this has been done by making use of adaptation and guarantees.

I believe that these reforms and new approaches to the techniques and approaches of labour legislation can also apply to international legal instruments.

In a globalized economy, there must be not only economic growth, but also social rules applicable in this field. These rules must be clear-cut as to their objectives and flexible in their approaches to attaining them. They must therefore be capable of adapting to the specific nature of the different systems of labour relations and also to different social and economic conditions.

When these international social rules – the counterpart of open trade in an already globalized economy – are being laid down, a balanced view is needed of the social and economic situation, which by its nature is very complex and diverse.

We will have to know how to reconcile minimum guarantees with the inegalitarian reality of our world. There is, to our mind, no doubt that there must be labour guarantees for questions ranging from freedom of association and collective bargaining to the protection of workers' health, including such basic subjects as the elimination of child labour, not to speak of forced labour. But the guarantees must take into consideration the very different situations of economic development.

The use of free trade to improve one's position on the international market while there is a complete lack of these rights is absolutely unacceptable. .

But, having said that, something else must be added. It would also be unfair to attempt to export the entire set of social conditions achieved at a certain level of development, not only economic development, but political as well, to countries or areas which unfortunately have not yet achieved such levels. Such a rigid approach would only put obstacles in the way of economic development which, to a great extent, must be the very motor which raises social levels. And at the same time, it would lead to new, hidden forms of protectionism which, if they are combined with attitudes which lack flexibility with respect to migratory flows, could lead to socially explosive situations and serious political instability.

I wish to conclude by once again emphasizing the problem of unemployment. It is no doubt the priority, if not the obsession, of my Government. It is a problem whose solution can only be found in a healthy, open, decentralized, flexible, competitive economy. And, let us not forget, in an economy which has solidarity. The problem of unemployment requires new responses, and perhaps much more daring ones.

In political and cultural areas such as the European Union, we have made progress which would have been unimaginable a few decades ago on the question of equal opportunity. None the less, a bigger problem, the most important source of inequality in our times, remains to be solved. I am talking about unemployment, the inequality between those who enjoy the benefits of a job and those who are searching for one in vain. We must therefore focus all our efforts on employment. We must emphasize the distribution of work, but not in terms of rationing a precious commodity. Indeed, one of the original defenders of the idea of "work sharing" complained of the "semantic disaster" the slogan had caused.

Let us therefore speak about distributing work to create more work. Let us distribute more equitably the three factors which determine employment: price, time, and quality.

This corresponds to wages, working time and skills, and the quality which stems from them and is of such great importance. Hence the overriding importance of training. The intelligence of the people is the essence of their well-being and wealth and, dare I add, of their freedom. Thus, vocational training has become the essential ally of employment policies. We must thus decisively place our stakes on vocational training policies.

In this, I feel we must show solidarity in the international field through a commitment to cooperation so that the ILO is given the means and authority to act. Its presence as an intermediary is no doubt a guarantee which we must all strengthen.

As I have just said, this support should be given in the more general framework of placing our stakes on the promotion of employment in an open, competitive economy, but also in an economy with more justice and greater solidarity.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – May I once more say how very pleased I am to see that this session of the Conference is being presided by a Workers' representative.

French employers and employers in general wish to associate themselves with the celebration of the ILO's 75th anniversary. It is their anniversary as well, since they may look back over three-quarters of a century during which they have made an active and positive contribution. They also wish to commemorate the Declaration of Philadelphia, to which they were parties, and they are particularly pleased to see here at this session, our old and respected colleague, Fernando Yllanes Ramos, who was one of the authors of this fundamental text.

As Chairman of the Employers' group, I should like to recall today my prestigious predecessors, Jules Carlier, Hans Christian Oersted, Sir John Forbes Watson, David Zellerbach, Pierre Waline, and Gullmar Bergenström. Our group's policy is one of continuity. It has always been our role to highlight the economic conditions inherent in social progress, but we have not acted, as is too often said, as the ILO's brakes. In particular, it was we who directed the Organization towards development that produced a bold, major programme of technical cooperation in the post-war years, and the names of David Morse and Francis Blanchard must be recalled in that context. We especially fostered support activities for vocational training and the development of small enterprises, which are crucial for the creation of productive jobs.

We were also involved in standard-setting work. We have always called for the strict application of Conventions ratified by member States as they were set down on paper, and we have not swerved from that course. Flexibility clauses should be incorporated when the standards are being negotiated, not when their application is being supervised.

We are also proud to have taken an active part in the Freedom of Association Committee, whose proceedings were marked significantly by Pierre Waline and Fernando Yllanes Ramos. The cases dealt with largely relate to workers' organizations and the recommendations have always been adopted unanimously. We have unswervingly voiced our conviction that without national employers' and workers' organizations that are truly free, independent and representative, there is no point in tripartism.

I believe that I need to state this at the risk of being accused of blowing our own trumpet. I am duty bound to do so, because no one else will, and because a sort of black legend appears to be forming around the Employers' present attitude. I must therefore be very precise.

ILO Conventions only become effective if they are freely ratified by States. This is one of the fundamental principles of our Constitution. The number of ratifications is apparently on the increase, since we have topped 6,000. In reality this rise is deceptive because it is the automatic result of the growing number of texts adopted by member States, often as a consequence of the splitting up of States. If you compare the number of ratifications with that of member States likely to ratify, you will see that on average the latter have only ratified a quarter of the instruments proposed. Even what are considered to be fundamental texts have only been ratified by approximately two-thirds of the States. As has been noted by the Director-General in his Report, this trend has become clearer over the last 20 years, and it also applies to Conventions which do not seem controversial at the time of adoption, like those relating to occupational health. It is true that it would be better not to ratify than to ratify them without the will or ability to apply them correctly.

This is why we recommend a new standards policy. Too many governments vote for texts that they know they will not be in a position to apply, and hence ratify. The complexity of the instruments and their excessive requirements render them ineffective in reality, since the majority of developing countries regard them as inaccessible, and at the same time they are not ratified by the most advanced nations. We must, therefore, establish a coherent, systematic plan for revising instruments that have not been ratified by enough countries, and in so doing bear in mind the reports of the Committee on the Application of Standards, which are not sufficiently taken into account when the Governing Body sets the agenda for the Conference. The establishment of new standards must be restricted to situations recognized as indispensable for achieving one of the ILO's accepted goals, when a large number of workers in virtually the entire world are affected, and there is sufficient consensus to produce a significant result. We have submitted detailed proposals to the Standards Committee on these lines, which I shall not repeat here for lack of time.

But, however important standards are, they are not the ILO's sole means of action. Cooperation with member States and their employers' and workers' organizations is an equally essential means of achieving the ILO's goals. The Declaration of Philadelphia proclaims the Organization's "solemn obligation to further implement, among the nations of the world, programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living". Technical cooperation, in its most general sense, is one of the best and most independent ways we have of promoting economic and social development, which are closely interlinked. Practical methods may change, but the principle of cooperation must remain at the heart of the ILO's ambitions. In many fields, general texts like those of Conventions are less effective than practical action that sets an example. This, inter alia, is the case with measures adopted to develop employment, a major priority in almost all States. In this field the ILO has most valuable resources, both at headquarters and in the regions, and especially at the Turin Centre, which is an establishment of particular importance servicing the goals of cooperation with and assistance to member States.

The setting-up of multidisciplinary teams is a source of great hope for us. For them to be effective, they must show a true team spirit and ensure smooth interaction with Geneva and its technical departments and also Turin. They must be schools of tripartism, and their priority must be to pass on to headquarters the needs and concerns of the ILO's constituents. This is the sense that we wish to attach to the partnership concept. We must serve our customers rather than impose pre-set ideas upon them.

The employers intend to participate actively in this collective action, and we also hope that our proposals and ideas will be better recognized in the ILO's general orientation. This orientation should include a true enterprise policy, reinforcing and complementing its traditional activities. It is quite obvious that the creation of the necessary productive jobs to meet the requirements of those entering the labour market must take place in the enterprise and in particular in new enterprises. Support for the enterprise creation is as much a social as an economic objective, and the ILO has the relevant qualified specialists in Geneva, in Turin and in the field. Nor should the enterprise be considered either as the object of ever-increasing obligations and constraints, but as the place where industrial relations are born and develop every day, and as a place for social innovation. The ILO's departments as a whole appear unfamiliar with this reality. Hence, measures must be adopted to bring our Organization closer to the business world. The ILO's highly valued action in support of employers' organizations in developing countries and the nations in transition is no longer sufficient. In all of our Organization's units, business concerns must be taken into account to the same extent as those of workers. The ILO will thus be better integrated into the trends of the major international, economic institutions.

It is my hope that these ideas will be taken into account when the final assessment of this important session of the Conference is drawn up.

Original Spanish: Mr. BROWN YOUNG (Workers' delegate, Costa Rica) – First of all, I should like to congratulate our friend, Mr. Gray, on his election to the presidency of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The word "crisis" comes from the Greek "Krino", which means to judge or decide; thus we must consider that the widespread changes the world has been undergoing – and which we consider a crisis – can serve as a lesson for our future action. We are indeed living a period of transition.

The ILO has celebrated its 75 years, and it must not stay out of the fray; on the contrary, it must strengthen its sense of purpose – its raison d'être – and confront the changes which are taking place in the labour world.

The ILO must never give up its natural role which is to look after labour relations. The steps it takes must always respond to this maxim, and it must disregard those who wish to push it dangerously to the precipice of increasing flexibility of the workforce.

The ILO must maintain its role as an arbiter and a critical conscience of the tripartite forum it represents; but it must be on its guard, now that the labour market is undergoing profound changes, not to allow this so-called increasing labour flexibility to undermine working conditions.

In the face of these challenges, the ILO cannot remain on the sidelines. Its action must be based on the fact that it is the only legitimate forum of the workers. It is necessary to strengthen and preserve the universal labour standards enshrined in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention 1948 (No. 87) and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention 1949 (No. 98). Throughout the world incalculable and painful acts of injustice are being committed which violate these fundamental principles of freedom.

There are those who wave the banner of labour flexibility – employers and some governments, and even some technocrats of the ILO itself; in so doing, they are committing an abomination and sounding the knell of this important institution.

We workers are not ready to abandon an inch of the defence of the principle of freedom. We believe that the ILO should continue to be the champion of international labour standards.

For years we have been witnessing changes in the style and nature of bargaining. At first, the approach was bipartite and specific and particularly developed within the area of collective bargaining and labour agreements. The trend then changed to tripartite negotiations – at both sectoral and national level – as a result of changes occurring in the 1970s and 1980s. We have now reached a stage characterized by social dialogue, where negotiations are at national and multisectoral level and claims and approaches are increasingly generalized.

We believe that it is necessary to place the area of competence of the ILO in its true perspective; i.e., we must emphasize the tripartite nature of this Organization with the help of the three distinct sectors – government, employers and workers. We would draw attention to the latter because, in the name of democracy, attempts are being made to promote the participation of pseudo-labour organizations which will undermine the true, genuine representation of workers.

This era requires that the ILO take a stand on the changes which are taking place in the labour market and the repercussions on the employment structure. These have arisen as a result of the emergence of new labour categories – and the disappearance of old ones.

Indeed, poverty, marginalization and widespread lack of protection, which are the outcome of economic systems geared exclusively to profit, have generated categories of workers such as migrants, home workers, child workers, sweatshop workers, workers in export processing zones, and new categories of workers in the rural and informal sectors.

Confronted with these new, emerging sectors, the ILO must set out to try and organize them and ensure that working conditions are adequately protected, especially as there are additional problems, such as: new forms of precarious work, new forms of modern employment, changes in work patterns due to flexibility and technological developments, privatization of the administration and the expansion of the informal sector.

We, as workers, must draw attention to any atypical standards or clauses providing for exceptions which are used to undermine labour legislation. We must avoid any exceptional "temporary" legislation or prerogatives which provide comparative advantages over other mechanisms, and to which governments have recourse to promote investments, facilitate the internationalization of the economy and encourage processes of labour in transit – such as sweatshops and export processing zones.

We must put an end to these abysmal situations, in which workers are exploited, and regulate labour relations in these areas; and we must call a halt to the violation of human rights and the rights of workers by enterprises.

We advocate a closer linkage between labour rights and human rights, so that the latent and persistent violation of labour laws can be dealt with by the various human rights agencies.

We believe that the ILO should adopt a firm stand on the consolidation of free trade treaties; indeed it should promote standard setting for labour laws within the scope of the World Trade Organization and in subregional trade treaties, bearing in mind the specific nature of subregional markets.

Consequently, it could elaborate special standards for sweatshops and export processing zones; and, more generally, it could draft standards on the internationalization of labour processes in order to avoid the exploitation of workers.

Furthermore, it must take concerted action to cope with the increase in economic globalization and proposals to make labour relations more flexible.

The labour force must not be seen as one more commodity to serve the mechanism of supply and demand. On the contrary, standards must be drafted to guarantee human development and the growth of the economy to satisfy its needs. In similar terms, a response must be given to the changes in labour relations on the basis of new theories of administration.

We are celebrating with joy the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. We firmly believe that the principles which lay behind the founding of this Organization are as valid today as they were 75 years ago.

In spite of the so-called progress achieved in freedom of association and collective bargaining, the workers of Costa Rica are aware – as reported by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations – that trade union leaders and workers are being dismissed for organizing freely in some private sectors such as transport, construction and export processing zones.

Collective bargaining is still a problem in the public sector.

As it cannot exercise a coercive role, the ILO should strengthen its activities to promote justice and social equity in the world of work.

These are the challenges before us all if the Organization is to thrive.

Mr. HADISUWITO (Employers' delegate, Indonesia) – It is a great privilege indeed for me to be given the opportunity to address the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Employers' Association of Indonesia (APINDO).

Firstly, I would like to congratulate the ILO on its 75th anniversary. Since its inception, the Organization has made marvellous achievements in its unending quest for ideal conditions for all peoples of all countries around the world and for full and quality employment.

Secondly, allow me to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents upon their assumption of the deserved positions in the Bureau of the Conference. I am confident that, with their vast experience and wise leadership, this session will end with the success expected by all participants.

Special words of appreciation and congratulations are also due to Mr. Hansenne, the ILO Director-General, for his outstanding and comprehensive Report on the ILO's past activities and achievements, which contains thought-provoking ideas to strengthen the role of the ILO in this fast-changing world.

APINDO, which represents the Indonesian employers, has witnessed the successful results of 25 years' hard work by the Government of the Republic of Indonesia with its 185 million population – the fourth biggest in the world. During the past 25 years of the first long-term development plan, Indonesia has substantially increased the prosperity of its people, and greatly reduced the number of people living below the poverty line. However, to reach the ideal of full employment and quality employment for all, as the set goal of the ILO, Indonesia still has a long, long way to go.

By ILO standards, the rate of unemployment in Indonesia is still very high, as stated by His Excellency, the Indonesian Minister of Manpower and, every year, at least 2.5 million school and university graduates enter the labour market, substantially increasing the unemployment rate. To avoid social unrest, this high rate of unemployment must be redressed as fast as possible. Otherwise, it will eventually jeopardize growth, stability and development.

At present, Indonesia is facing two crucial manpower problems: how to create more jobs to absorb the ever-increasing labour supply; and how to improve the working standards of employed workers.

Entering the Sixth Five-Year Plan (1994-98), the Government will give a greater role to the private sector, since this sector's contribution to the development of the country is also growing.

While APINDO, on behalf of the Indonesian employers, is already prepared to support the Government in its efforts to implement national development plans, in particular by absorbing more and more labour, the Indonesian employers have clear realization of their limits. Should the Indonesian employers concentrate only on measures to improve the working conditions and standards of existing employed workers, it would hamper expansion of industry, and leave the unemployed people helpless.

Similarly, if it concentrates on measures to absorb more labour, it will be unable to improve the working standards of its workers as stipulated by the ILO and as expected by all parties involved. In view of this dilemma, it is necessary to analyse the situation as it is and not just merely apply the standards of developed countries, which are unlikely to fully match existing conditions. I believe that this difficult situation is one experienced not only by Indonesia, but one also faced by other developing countries.

Sufficient time must be allocated for Indonesian industries to catch up with their more developed neighbours. While trying to expand industry to absorb more labour, it will be very difficult for Indonesian industries to fully comply with the existing standards, no matter how much they wish to achieve compliance. However, we are sure that, in the not too distant future, we will be able to catch up with other ILO Members and comply fully with ILO standards. In this context, we find it very difficult to accept any attempt to link any form of social clause with international trade.

We believe that this approach will solve the most crucial problems that Indonesia and other developing countries are now facing. Some time in the future, all these countries will be able to comply fully with ILO standards.

In Indonesia, tripartite cooperation has been practised successfully between the Government, employers and workers. One example is the agreement on the new minimum wage, that was implemented in January and April 1994. Although the employers see the new agreement as giving the workers a big increase – approximately 35 per cent – nevertheless, they feel that the new minimum wage is another necessary and significant step towards improving workers' welfare.

Furthermore, many labour disputes can be solved satisfactorily for all parties concerned after consultations at the tripartite level. We believe that, through tripartite discussion, we will eventually reach harmonious labour relations which will contribute to the country's steady development and to the people's welfare.

Mr. MACIEJCZYK (Employers' delegate, Poland) – It is a great honour to address the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on behalf of the Confederation of Polish Employers. Allow me to congratulate the President and the officials of the Conference on their election and, as the Conference will end this week, express gratitude for their responsible work.

Poland has been a Member of the ILO since its foundation in 1919. The activities and the input into our Organization's achievements have been different in different periods of our history.

The 75th anniversary of the ILO causes us to reflect on the Organization's contribution to universal and lasting peace through the promotion and development of social justice, and to rethink the basic directions our Organization's activities should take in the future.

I would like to congratulate the Director-General on his Report to this Conference. Its title, Defending values, promoting change, already gives an indication of where we are and where we intend to go.

Totalitarian systems are on their way out. Newborn democracies are trying to find their way. Transition to a market economy requires more flexibility on the part of all partners, and places on the State the obligation to create a balance between economic changes and social justice.

The ILO's standard-setting activities, by their great ethical value, have a large influence on local standards. Nevertheless, we have found that some Conventions have not passed the most important test – ratification and application by member States. Moreover, some Conventions, although ratified, are no longer relevant to the new economic and technological scene.

With its high number of member States, the ILO is the most universal of the international organizations and the values it defends are themselves universal. The standard-setting procedure should pay due attention to the member States' diversity of socio-economic conditions.

Conventions should exhibit a universal character. The inclusion of numerous details in Conventions creates limits and barriers to ratification. The Confederation of Polish Employers would like to express the hope that this will be taken into consideration in upcoming Conventions.

We support the statement in the Director-General's Report that: "In these difficult times our attention should therefore turn not so much to the work to be done, but to the values that we have to defend".

The guarantee that these values will be protected and defended in the new democracies of Central and Eastern Europe is tripartism. This is also the best instrument for guiding changes in the direction of democracy.

The economies of Central and Eastern Europe have experienced cumulative falls in industrial output and a general increase of unemployment. We quite often hear that, in the former socialist countries, the key to successful transition to a market economy lies in the privatization of state enterprises. In our countries, at the same time as we undertake our economic transition, we also have to transform the mentality of society – and this may be the more difficult task.

The social and labour problems which appear during transition to a market economy have never been encountered before. Dealing with them requires the implementation of new policies and the use of highly qualified specialists in new areas.

The values espoused by the ILO and the support given by the Technical Cooperation Programme play an important role in addressing those problems and in strengthening the fragile democracies.

Social dialogue in Poland should strongly depend on tripartism. The Confederation of Polish Employers hopes that the ILO will assist technically in implementing this to the full.

Collective bargaining between workers and employers can lead to creative and effective solutions. The State should play a regulatory role in economic and social affairs.

At present, in Poland, relations between the social partners are strongly influenced by the historical domination of the trade unions. Although, in 1991, the Polish Parliament adopted a new law creating a legal basis for tripartism, the lack of balance as regards rights between trade unions and employers' organizations is evident.

Moreover, existing financial regulations are blocking the existence and development of employers' organizations. In respect of the planned changes in the Labour Code and the predominating role of collective bargaining in the new economic and social system, Polish employers expect the Polish Government to take action to provide equal status and treatment for all social partners.

I would like to finish by saying that the time has come for the ILO to promote change and continue defending values like democracy, human dignity, tripartism – the time has come for the social partners in my country to do so as well.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.30 p.m.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (concl.)

The PRESIDENT (Mr. MENDOZA) – We shall continue the discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

Original Spanish: Mr. ELÍAS SAINZ (Government delegate, Bolivia) – It is on behalf of the Government of Bolivia, our constitutional President, His Excellency Gonzalo Sánchez de Lozada, the Minister of Labour Mr. Reynaldo Peters Arzabe, and of the delegation accredited to this great and historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference and on my own behalf that I wish to express to the President of the Conference and his Officers our most sincere congratulations, both on their election as well as on the excellent work they are doing.

We come to this session in full awareness of the significance for all the member countries of the International Labour Organization and especially for the founding Members, of the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and of the 50th anniversary of the adoption by this Organization of the Declaration of Philadelphia. Both events have historic significance, they were born of a generative process closely linked to the social struggles of the workers in a world that remains threatened and vulnerable. Such historical precedents justify the fact that the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference gives special recognition to the courage, sacrifice and fortitude of the workers of the world, values upon which leaders like Ernesto Mahaim, Arthur Fontaine, Charles Guide and others based the structure of the ILO. Against this background we consider it historically appropriate that Mr. Charles Gray, an imminent leader of the workers of the United States of America, has been chosen to preside over this event.

The Report presented this year to the Conference by the Director-General, Mr. Michel Hansenne, in both content and structure constitutes a document that is not only of great topical significance, but contains the very concept of the ILO of today and above all, the projection of the ILO of tomorrow. In its spirit it is encouraging to note that the ILO will continue to carry out the fundamental mission for which it was created: to contribute to world peace through the promotion of social justice. It will continue through its tripartite structure to be a mobilizing and effective force, and it will adapt its action as an international organization together with its Secretariat, to the new tasks and challenges of an era of profound change.

Bolivia, its Government and its people are also facing times of change and structural adjustment, both nationally and on the international level. Twelve years of democratic life have given rise in the political arena to a high level of civic and administrative responsibility. Socially speaking a range of protective measures and of training initiatives is being promoted, and economically speaking programmes to promote economic activity that, while requiring some initial sacrifices, will enable the community in the short and medium term to improve their living conditions, and have access to better jobs and to earnings that are in line with their aspirations.

The action of the Government on the basis of the "Plan for All" programme, the capitalization of enterprises, popular participation, the educational reform and other collateral measures such as the policy of dialogue and consensus which has been put into force, is set to respond to the challenge of the emerging and ever more extreme globalization of the economy, to the defence of human capital and its spiritual and traditional values, to the struggle against poverty and to maintaining a sustained effort that avoids the Government having to limit its capacity to apply its programmes and develop the most effective policies to promote social progress, and at the same time it guarantees citizens the free exercise of their rights.

The Government of Bolivia emphasizes the realistic and modern concept of the contents of the Report of the Director-General and considers it necessary to maintain the universal character of the ILO, to reactivate and above all to update ILO standards and the mechanisms to supervise their application, to preserve tripartism, to maintain sustained and direct contact with all of the organizations of the community of the United Nations, putting emphasis on those that are economically oriented, stressing the role of the pillar of social policy that should characterize the ILO today more than ever before.

The majority of the peoples of the world are facing a turn of the century that is characterized by manifest change. However, the majority of these peoples are living in conditions of poverty and unemployment, with critical levels of health, education, housing and employment. Faced with this reality we ask ourselves, can the ILO alone through its sole efforts even show the way towards the solution of the labour problem, which is the best approach to reducing the other negative indicators I have mentioned? We honestly do not think so. However, if all the member countries with their governments, their employers and their workers assume the responsibility of preserving values and promoting change, then we do think that the ILO will indeed be able to play its revolutionary role in the coming millennium.

Original German: Mrs. ENGELEN-KEFER (Workers' delegate, Germany) – At the end of this biennium, we are confronted with greater problems than we have experienced since the Second World War. Patently, the world's economy is at present working so badly that it is harming both the direct and long-term interests of all nations.

The problems of unemployment, poverty, hunger, population explosion, devastation of nature and the environment are all becoming more and more burdensome. Each day men and women are exposed to humiliating violations and trade union rights are being trampled underfoot. The aspirations of the founding fathers and mothers of the International Labour Organization to construct an international community marked by social equality and justice, have as yet remained unfulfilled. How is it that, now that the East-West conflict has dissipated, we are not able to give the International Labour Organization the kind of boost that it received from its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia after the First and Second World Wars? The opportunities to establish a social development agenda are not being exploited. Are we lacking the serious political will to carry out a social and economic redirectioning, or have our social senses been dulled and our behaviour become determined by short-sighted confrontation and the drive for personal profit? It is simply just not good enough to relegate the celebration of social justice to periodic international conferences whilst in practice the concept becomes empty words. Nationally and internationally, we have to be prepared to share with the have-nots. There is no way that we can successfully respond to present-day challenges with a system of winners and losers. We need to defend the values and standards of the International Labour Organization more than ever before. Without them, there can be no true economic development and even less justice and democracy. Globalization of social hazards calls for a policy reaching out beyond the shadows of church towers and the horizon of national borders. It would be disastrous if the triumph of the market economy were to bring about a throw-back to wild-west capitalism. Our experience in what was the German Democratic Republic demonstrates that market processes have to be maintained within a social framework defined by the State to ensure that private activities for personal gain do not conflict with social priorities and the freedom of others. If we want to prevent unacceptable and dangerous extremist solutions, a balance has to be found between economic market efficiency and social equity. This applies in particular to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund adjustment programmes. The International Labour Organization should, at the same time, be given the opportunity to examine the economic and financial policy activities of other international organizations to see whether they are observing and complying with key Conventions. The centre point of any social strategy must be to restimulate production, because countries everywhere are suffering from the canker of unemployment. We must not succumb to the danger of repeating the economic and political mistakes made after the First World War and throttle world trade. On the contrary, we need to learn the lessons of the past and crank up the world economy. This is a task for G7 countries in particular. Coordinated activities between several industrialized countries will have more than double the employment-generating effect of isolated national measures. Here, however, we have to ensure that the economy and the environment are kept in tune. Poverty belts, in particular in Africa, also need more international assistance in order to carry out longer-term projects – for instance in irrigation, transport, reforestation and soil erosion control. The ILO should relaunch its discussion on employment and basic needs strategies dating from the 1970s. Further development of such strategies could make a key contribution to a successful conclusion of the World Summit for Social Development.

When it comes to investments to raise productivity and incomes, the poor must, wherever possible, be given priority because economic growth achieved by increased capital spending will not automatically lead to higher employment levels and better standards of living for all. The way we make the cake also determines how it will be shared out. Due attention must be paid to the basic needs of the poorest segments of society and to job creation. One key factor in the long-term survival of free world trade and the ratification and implementation of the decisions taken in the Uruguay Round is the establishment of fair competition. In our worries about jobs, we often forget that north-south trade is not a one-way street. The German trade unions expressly support the principles of open and fair world trade. The demand for social clauses is often misunderstood and incorrectly interpreted. It is not our intention to discriminate against the developing countries or whittle away their natural advantages nor demand a new protectionism for industrialized countries. Rather we are proposing a differentiated system that would function with positive incentives; trade sanctions should only be applied in cases of extreme violations and only after multiple warnings. If, for instance, wages are negotiated by free trade unions in free collective bargaining and are not artificially maintained at unacceptably low levels then there should be no case for applying to social clauses. We do not want to involve all ILO standards, just certain inalienable fundamental ILO standards such as Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 28 and 111. States which actively implement these standards and apply the profit they obtain from world trade to social progress should be given positive encouragement and trade facilities. The inclusion of elementary social clauses into trade should strengthen cooperation and go hand in hand with the mutual obligations and rights of industrialized and developing countries. The ILO must be accorded a central role in this and, thus ensure cooperation with the World Trade Organization. The German trade unions have made a specific discussion proposal on social clauses, and will be happy to provide you with copies on request. We welcome the fact that the Director-General, in his excellent Report, has dealt with the subject of social clauses. This also goes for the question of how multinational enterprises can be brought to comply more with international social standards. We are specifically calling for an international Convention on specific aspects of international enterprises. Undertakings should voluntarily adhere to this Convention and, in this way, submit themselves to ILO supervision. The non-compulsory nature of the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy shows just how important further development is here. "The end of the Cold War and of the ideological divisions between blocs will usher in a new era in which we will witness a strengthening of basic social and labour rights", as the Director-General says in his Report. Despite this realization, we are very concerned since the attacks sometimes overt and sometimes couched in diplomatic language, against the ILO's supervisory machinery are not being fended off; in addition, there are complaints about an allegedly "maximalist strategy" in standard setting. What is being missed is that the ILO is itself becoming the target of worldwide deregulation efforts. We too definitely support the concept that the ILO's operations can and should become more interdisciplinary. Under no circumstances should this be accompanied by a weakening of the supervisory machinery that has proved its worth; rather this machinery should be reinforced. If we are not to endanger the ILO's foundations, then we must reject out of hand any attempts to restrict the right to strike and trade union rights via international interpretations of ILO standards. Our fears that the world is distancing itself more and more from the objective of development on the basis of solidarity appear well founded. We all have an obligation, not only to keep the ILO alive, but also to make it a central and indispensable force in the international development process. We cannot afford to disappoint these hopes for an international community worthy of the name.

Mr. SHABANGU (Minister of Labour and Public Services, Swaziland) – Let me begin by congratulating the President on his election to the office of conducting the proceedings of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. At this stage, it is already clear that under his able leadership this Conference will achieve its objectives.

We meet at an important point in the history of this Organization, as we celebrate the 75th anniversary of the ILO itself and, of course, the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Report of the Director-General of the ILO places an appropriate challenge before all member States, and especially the delegates and officers of this Organization. The challenges facing our Organization in the future require us to define clearly the future role of the ILO in a world suffering from high rates of unemployment, deteriorating economies, wars and persistent poverty. The contribution which the ILO, as the oldest United Nations agency, must make to the Social Summit must be viewed as a major challenge. The ILO is the only agency that brings together the three major actors in development, that is labour, management and government.

It is our firm belief that, if these three factors were to work in cooperation, no problem would be too difficult to solve. The ideals that inspired those who came before us in 1919 and 1944 have been given new prominence by the greater and more emphatic globalization of trade in goods and services, which gives rise to structures designed to facilitate the satisfaction of needs through more open trade among nations and among regions. For purposes of trade and the satisfaction of our basic needs, we are citizens of a global village. This means that we have to think and act as citizens of the same world. This, however, in our view, should not be interpreted to suggest that national identities will have to disappear. The diversity of cultures, national identities and national personalities can enrich the global village and ensure its strength and not add to its weaknesses. Consequently, the ideal norms and aspirations of the ILO apply to nation States. It is on this basis, therefore, that we have to think nationally and act globally. In size, Swaziland is a very small country, but as a Member of the ILO, it has the same needs and aspirations as any other member State. We also support the mission of the ILO in its pursuit of social justice and respect for human dignity. Although we support the abolition of the exploitation of people, and are religiously committed to fair and equitable trade among nations, we are not convinced that the much-talked-about social clause and its conditions are positive ways of addressing these social and economic issues. We in Swaziland are convinced that the existing statutes and Conventions of the ILO are sufficient, as instruments, to handle these matters. The inclusion of a social clause over and above the existing ILO instruments would be viewed by us as a form of action to reduce the trade and capacities of certain nations and thus cause more social problems than it would solve. At worst, such clauses may cause us to suspect that the real intention was to weaken our countries' productivity and trading abilities, and lead to less employment and more social problems. It is on the basis of this that we call upon the ILO firmly to organize a frank discussion on the likely impact of regional and global trade agreements, before we can talk about social clauses. This haste seems rather undignified and could lead some nations, including Swaziland, to suspect that there is more to this matter than meets the eye.

Opening up trade through such structures and institutions as GATT is understandable and desirable in our view. Any conditions that go with it must be openly and thoroughly negotiated by the States in a spirit of equality. Swaziland believes that the ILO will resent being used as a forum for pursuing the objectives of power blocs. It is under the ILO that we feel we are equal partners as nations, and any move to tilt this delicate balance has to be given careful consideration.

Having said all this, we in Swaziland firmly believe that the ILO, through its standard-setting machinery, should pursue the ideals of social justice as the foundation of national, as well as global, economic development.

At this stage I would like to add my voice in welcoming those States that have recently joined the ILO. The family of States represented by this Organization looks forward to their meaningful contribution to the challenges facing the world of labour, a world in which world economies threaten the growth of small economies. May I welcome in a special way the delegation of free and democratic South Africa. As a Member of the ILO, and, as a southern African State, Swaziland is proud of the achievements realized after such a long struggle for democracy in that region. We are encouraged to hope that similar struggles for democracy elsewhere in the world will be victorious. Developments in the Middle East give us hope that peace will soon prevail in that part of the world as well.

Finally, may I conclude by commending the Director-General on his thought-provoking Report. We are living in a changing world and therefore we have to change the strategies of this Organization to adapt them to the changing environment in which we live. Swaziland is appreciative of the role the ILO is playing in the development of good industrial relations. We look forward to gaining more under the active partnership policy implemented through the multidisciplinary teams. Our Government is working hard to create employment opportunities. However, our Government is also fully aware that, in this competitive world, good industrial relations are a prerequisite for attracting investment to our country.

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' delegate, Australia) – May I take this opportunity to congratulate the President on his election to chair this important session of the International Labour Conference, which commemorates the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization.

It is entirely appropriate that the ILO should at this time engage in a process of reflection and re-evaluation concerning its fundamental concerns and objectives and, in that context, concerning its current and future activities.

The Report of the Director-General which is the subject of discussion at this session of the Conference serves to focus our attention on some of the principal issues which need to be addressed. However, the Report, this discussion, and the Director-General's reply to the discussion, cannot be seen as the end of the process. Further thought and reflection, particularly within the Governing Body, is required before the Organization can be set in a new direction which will confirm and strengthen its relevance.

While no report of this type would ever hope to be the subject of universal agreement as to its scope and its proposals, the Report under discussion does, in my view, have a number of deficiencies which detract from its usefulness.

The Report accurately summarizes the seriousness of unemployment throughout the world and the need for the ILO to play a major role in addressing this social disaster. But it is over-cautious in its prescriptions for a re-ordering of the ILO's priorities. Given the dimensions of the problem, a more radical reorientation is required. The Report is also over-pessimistic and over-critical in its treatment of some major elements such as technological change, the liberalization of trade, globalization and multinational enterprises, all of which produce major benefits which have largely gone unrecognized.

The global move towards the market economy and private enterprise provides the greatest and indeed the only opportunity to reduce the scourge of unemployment through the only means possible, which is economic growth. This will also require continuing structural adjustment, privatization and greater flexibility in markets, including the labour market.

New technologies and processes are being developed with increasing rapidity and enterprises are under increasing pressure to change and adapt their operations. This involves both the creation of new jobs and the development of new workforce skills through training. It is for this reason that human resources development has become a top priority for enterprises. It is disappointing that this issue attracts so little attention in the Report.

Similarly, the role of the modern enterprise as the engine of development is unrecognized, as are the many constructive and positive developments in the relationships between management and labour at the enterprise level. In many countries employers and employees have discovered a community of interest in their responses to economic pressures and have learned to work together for mutual objectives rather than against each other in an atmosphere of conflict. This may well be one of the most important labour market developments of recent years, and the ILO should be fostering its extension actively. This failure to appreciate the changes which have taken place at the level of the enterprise is an example of the tendency of the Office to view labour relations in a legal, technical and institutional sense rather than in a practical workplace sense.

Similarly, the Report fails to deal with the importance of productivity growth as an indispensable means of improving living standards and economic growth.

I want to make some comments on tripartism which is, of course, a fundamental principle of our Organization, and one which is essential to its proper functioning. And yet there is obviously still a degree of misconception about tripartism.

The Conference has been told in this discussion that tripartism is out of date, that it disenfranchises other interest groups and that it gives associations of employers and workers undue prominence. These assertions have validity only in the minds of those making them.

The essence of tripartism is that associations of employers and workers should be allowed to be formed and to develop in freedom. They must be able to formulate their programmes and pursue their activities and objectives free of interference so long as they operate within the law. That law must not unreasonably restrict their freedom and activities. The existence of these two groups forms the basis for dialogue with governments. It is that dialogue which is the expression of tripartism.

Tripartism does not require that employers' and workers' associations be intimately involved in government decision-making; if they are so involved then that is a choice made by the government concerned. However, it is necessary for them to be consulted adequately about the matters which concern them, and for them to understand that their views are being heard and taken into consideration.

This process does not, of course, prevent governments from taking account of the views of other interest groups. Clearly, tripartism cannot give to associations of employers and workers a monopoly in relation to influence on governments.

However, the proposal made by the Director-General to give other interest groups a voice within the ILO itself raises issues of quite a different nature. The ILO cannot be equated in this sense with the governments of its member States. Governments make decisions which are applied to the citizens of the country concerned and if they do not take account of the views of all those citizens then, in a democracy, they will not survive.

The ILO, on the other hand, was founded to allow governments, representatives of employers and representatives of workers to come together to attempt to formulate common objectives and to develop policies which might be adopted by its member States if they so wish. The ILO does not impose and cannot impose its decisions on anyone.

To dilute the ILO's forums by the addition of other interest groups would serve no purpose except to assist those who wish to weaken the influence within the ILO of employers and workers. This proposition and its inevitable consequences are totally unacceptable. The ILO is not a world forum for every interest group which now exists or might develop in the future.

I also wish to make some comments about the ILO's approach to standard setting.

Standards are an important means, but not the only means, of achieving the ILO's objectives. The Report correctly identifies some, but not all, of the problems associated with the current standard-setting procedures. It should be clear that in a world which is showing increasing concern to provide for less regulation of the labour market so as to leave more possibilities for negotiation, there is a fundamental problem for an organization which devotes itself to facilitating more regulation. This is an important factor in the stagnation of the number of ratifications, and it is one reason why governments which vote for the adoption of standards never ratify them.

It should also be clear that it is becoming increasingly difficult to adopt standard-setting items which have a high degree of relevance.

The question which needs to be asked is whether the adoption of new standards on a particular subject would have a positive or negative effect on job creation.

A number of steps should be taken to improve standard-setting procedures: more relevant topics should be chosen and there should be more possibilities for the revision of existing instruments; recommendations should be given an improved status as stand-alone instruments. It is not always necessary to produce a Convention and a Recommendation on a particular subject, and in the process to treat Recommendations as mere appendages to Conventions; the method of drawing up questionnaires and Office texts requires review and improvement so as to emphasize flexibility and the possibilities of consensus; the timetable for technical committees should allow sufficient opportunities for consultations and the development of consensus; the problems created by the grouping of member States cannot be ignored. This is particularly important in the case of the member States of the European Union and the consequence of their exerting too great an influence on standard setting to the detriment of ratification prospects. This issue is mentioned only in passing in the Report; the conditions under which a Convention comes into force should be revised, so as to avoid the problems of Conventions coming into force but receiving few subsequent ratifications; and lastly, there should be more possibilities for denunciation of a Convention in recognition of the speed with which economic and social conditions change.

Finally, I wish to endorse the suggestion made by the Director-General that consideration be given to the establishment of procedures similar to those of the Committee on Freedom of Association in order to deal with complaints on other basic human rights issues, such as discrimination. This would, I believe, be a genuinely innovative way in which to adapt the ILO's procedures to the realities of today.

In conclusion, I would like to thank the Director-General for providing a Report which, while provocative in some respects and deficient in others, has none the less established a focus for this discussion, which is a crucial step in the reform of our Organization.

Mr. TROTMAN (Workers' delegate, Barbados) – Permit me formally to congratulate the President on his election to chair this session of the Conference, and to thank the relevant governments for giving way to allow the Workers' group to have a nominee in the chair at this historic 75th anniversary session of the Conference. I also wish to congratulate the President's entire team on their efficient use of our time throughout the Conference.

Permit me to depart slightly from my script to congratulate the Government and people of South Africa for the work that they have done to bring them to the position of being present in the Conference on this occasion.

I am authorized to inform you that although I am the Workers' delegate from Barbados, I am empowered to speak for organized labour within the Caribbean basin covered by their affiliation to the Caribbean Congress of Labour. I particularly speak for the delegations from Antigua, Bahamas, Bermuda, Belize, Grenada, Guyana, Surinam, Trinidad and Tobago and, of course, Barbados, all of whom have participated in this session of the Conference.

We all wish on this occasion to repeat the concerns of the labour movement in the Caribbean at the lack of proper regard by international financial institutions for the welfare of small or developing economies, such as those existing in our region as well as many in Africa and in parts of Asia and Latin America.

We are forced to repeat here our rejection of the "castor oil mentality" which causes these financial medicine men to prescribe the same laxative for all ailing patients as long as they are from a developing region, and our horror that those legislators with influence, who are fully aware of such atrocities, do nothing about it. It is difficult to understand, if I may use an example, how we can be complacent in any environment in which a country, which has been raped and ravaged for foreign profit, is diagnosed as one which will be able to recover, but which is then prescribed an impossible course of medicine which demands that almost 90 per cent of its GDP is used up in debt repayment annually. And if this case of Guyana is extreme in the level of demand, let us think of the other comparable examples across the world and ask ourselves whether they serve the cause of anyone.

Indeed, it is clear that many of these patients will weaken and collapse entirely if they strive to complete such a course of medicine. We in the Caribbean, are satisfied that "enlightened self-interest" – if nothing else – should propel the industrialized world to initiate a new prescription which calls, among other things, for a "debt-forgiveness programme"; the establishment of institutions which will ensure appropriate human resources development, the provision of certain minimal social and human rights standards and the implementation of what may be regarded as an international central bank role for the International Monetary Fund which will permit that institution to regulate and to counter undue exploitation of the money market by any one power.

We are encouraged in this submission by our awareness of the worldwide level of unemployment and underemployment and our recognition that the recovery programmes which are being enunciated cannot be successful if there are pockets of substandard, subhuman living conditions interrupting the global landscape. While such conditions may appear to suit the personal or the corporate goals of the few, it must by now be accepted that the broader objectives of the communities even in industrialized countries will be severely undermined. In short, labour in the Caribbean still believes that "poverty anywhere constitutes a danger to prosperity everywhere".

We, in the Caribbean, have tried to live in accordance with that universal dictum. I do not say that to suggest that we are paragons of virtue, but merely to suggest that for us as an ILO family to advance, we have to do so from a common acceptable point of departure. The dictum quoted is not the intellectual property of any specific region or select group. It is the "common call to arms" of this illustrious Organization whose 75 years of existence can honestly be said to have been 75 years spent in the promotion of peace, democracy and human dignity.

The international labour standards agreed to at sessions of the Conference have proven to be invaluable to us. It is true and inexcusable that our governments have failed to ratify any significant number of Conventions since our various Caribbean countries have obtained independence. However, much of the social engineering which has taken place in the last 30 years owes its origin to one or other of the various ILO standards which have been set. We go further to record that even where standards have not been ratified, employers and workers' unions have used them as their reference point in addressing certain aspects of our collective bargainings in the region. We have, for example, agreed to remove discrimination clauses and practices from our labour management contracts and even within our legislation, even where the ILO standard has not been ratified. Similarly, we insist that our children should be given the freedom to socialize through school and play before being exposed to the world of work as teenagers.

Additionally, we have moved to institutionalize the practice of discussion and consultation, firstly on a bipartisan basis and now through tripartism. Our arrangements still leave much to be desired, but we make the point here to show the relevance of the ILO as the setter of trends and standards. Where this approach is found acceptable to the governments and employers, they may find, as we have found, a labour movement willing to take the initiative in putting forward discussions for productivity issues or for protocols for wages and incomes policies as we have managed to do.

On such an historic occasion, it is proper that this house should reflect on its terms of reference and on its record of performance. There will be some who will say for the ILO, as there are many who will say for the United Nations especially when it continues to address social issues without reference to the social partners, that the Organization has outlived its usefulness. Labour in the Caribbean does not share that view; we see the ILO as the conscience of the market-place in an otherwise harsh and inconsiderate world. We therefore salute the Organization for its achievements so far, and we urge you all to remain focused and committed to the objectives of our founding fathers.

Mr. MALENTACCHI (representative, International Metalworkers' Federation) – I would like to follow the many other speakers in congratulating the President on his election and wish him every success, especially in this key 75th anniversary session of the Conference which will set the stage for many sessions of the International Labour Conference on activities in the future.

Many of the crucial challenges facing us have been and will be addressed at this session of the Conference, and I would like to add my voice in the name of the 18 million metalworkers worldwide to some of these issues.

In April this year, in Marrakesh, the world's governments agreed to set up a new World Trade Organization. The International Metalworkers' Federation fought long and hard for some reference to workers' rights in the mandate of the new body, and we were glad that the question was raised forcibly in Morocco.

I am specially grateful to leaders of unions in certain Asian, Latin American and African countries who supported the call for a world social clause in the GATT, even if they met with the hostility of their governments to this concept.

But the fight is not over yet.

The Preparatory Committee for the World Trade Organization has a mandate to include new issues on its agenda, including workers' rights, and we will have to continue to put pressure on governments and international agencies to ensure that workers' rights are not forgotten; and the ILO has a special responsibility here to work with the GATT and the new World Trade Organization for a social clause to be included in the rules of international trade.

We continue to insist that the new world of trade and production must have a social element built into it by means of respecting ILO Conventions. Nations that do not respect human rights at work, which force children to work or which forbid the right of workers to form independent trade unions, must be exposed. It is not low wages but the violation of human rights at work that is the unfair subsidy too many authoritarian governments award themselves.

We are also concerned at what many others have seen as a concerted and organized offensive to reduce the ILO's role as a universal upholder of international labour standards. We believe that, on the contrary, the time is ripe to reaffirm the ILO's values and strengthen its capacity for intervention in defence of its standards.

In my own organization, the International Metalworkers' Federation, we have been grappling with many of the issues that have occupied the thoughts of many of the speakers in this forum. Just a few weeks ago, our Central Committee discussed and adopted a Metalworkers' Charter for Social and Economic Alternatives.

There are many sad benchmarks of our societies on the eve of the twenty-first century which threaten peaceful development and human progress. But the real shackles on economic growth, job creation and rising living standards throughout the world are not a lack of natural, financial or human resources, but outdated institutions and political concepts.

Obviously, there are vast and unfulfilled needs in the developing as well as in the developed world, but our institutions have proven incapable of transforming that human need into economic demand.

Our basic strategy is simple: economic growth must be relaunched wherever it is lagging, and workers must share in the wealth that they create.

We demand that respect for political democracy, human rights and environmental protection be made a condition for participating in international economic exchanges. We do not accept that the existence of different stages of economic development is a licence to destroy the environmental basis on which growth depends or to violate basic human, democratic and trade union rights.

There are growing flows of trade and investment that ignore international standards of rights, and environmental protection, which increase international competition based on social and labour costs, thereby threatening employment, wages and working conditions.

In the developed economies, there is insufficient private investment because of depressed demand. Public sector deficits are growing primarily because of rising unemployment. To reverse this situation, a concerted public sector investment programme is needed.

Fair conditions for the developing countries and those in Eastern and Central Europe must be created by reducing interest rates, stabilizing prices for primary products, and the opening of markets in the developed world.

Aid programmes must be adapted to real economic circumstances, to grant help so that these countries can help themselves to satisfy the basic needs of their people and to protect and restore the environment.

The anarchy in the world's financial markets deprives the productive economy of resources and is a serious impediment to effective economic policies.

The international financial system must be restored to its proper role – that of facilitating international exchanges in the real economy.

Industrial development must be shared between developed and developing countries, and the process of change must be controlled, not chaotic.

In addition to such industrial policies, monetary and fiscal policies must be coordinated as well. Unemployment, inflation and unsustainable trade balances cannot be allowed to shift uncontrollably around the globe, stifling economic growth and social development.

Education and training must not be confined to narrow, job-specific skills, but prepare workers for the wide variety of challenges that the future will bring. Programmes should be managed by a tripartite (union-employer-government) basis.

An imaginative use of worktime reductions could strengthen the link between economic growth and job-creation, encourage the continued education of the workforce and help balance family responsibilities. All the restructuring at the enterprise level, and the introduction of new work organizations can be used to reduce working time and encourage employment.

Such changes must of course be negotiated by the parties concerned, but obviously these are far better alternatives than mass lay-offs.

In the current environment of insecurity, and without a role in decision-making, change cannot help but be perceived as threatening by workers and their trade unions.

The current drive to enforce the labour market's so called "flexibility" by destroying social safety nets is bound to be resisted by working people and their representatives – they will seek "security against change".

Instead, we propose that workers be given "security in change" by buttressing social safety nets, and putting in place a framework of negotiations between government, employers and unions on the management of necessary changes.

Time restrictions, unfortunately, limit the possibility of pursuing this debate, but it is one that will continue to occupy the ILO and this session of the Conference.

We will return to many of these issues in the run-up to the World Summit for Social Development which should be a great opportunity for the ILO to reassert its influence and play a leading part in the whole United Nations system.

Mr. MICHALZIK (representative, Miners International Federation) – First of all, I have the privilege of congratulating the President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, and I also wish to thank the Director-General of the ILO for the excellent Reports produced for this session marking the 75th anniversary of the ILO.

I also wish to seize this opportunity to congratulate the workers of South Africa on the successful completion of their struggle against apartheid, a system which prevented the South African people from taking their rightful place in this very Organization.

I represent an organization, the Miners International Federation, which was founded 105 years ago in order to safeguard and to protect the interests of mineworkers on an international level.

The Director-General in his Report deals particularly with the features of a changing world, that is the disappearance of the Communist bloc, the globalization of the economy, and the proliferation of social problems. All these are elements that have had tremendous influence on our structure, and our membership, which has grown over the last four years from 1 million to almost 5 million.

But contrary to other international workers' organizations, the growth of our membership is due not only to political and social changes in Eastern and Central Europe, where the mining industries, while undergoing a process of restructuring, still provide employment on a massive scale, but also to a phenomenon described as a shift of mining operations from the Northern hemisphere to the South, that is from high-wage to low-wage countries. Whilst pits in Sweden, Belgium, Germany, England, Spain and Japan have been closed, new mines have been opened in countries like Colombia, Venezuela, Brazil, Chile and in a number of African and Asian countries as well.

Another concern of ours is caused by the big gap in the application of mining technology. It is not uncommon that, even in one country, some mines operate with advanced technology, while others operate under conditions reminding us of the last century. The effect of this is that, even in the same country, the wage ratio could be seven to one, and working conditions are not comparable.

We also consider the small-scale mining sector to be problematic. On the one hand, it produces 25 per cent of all world mining products and is rapidly expanding. On the other, it lacks the barest minimum of state supervision and inspection.

Against this background, an international workers' organization can only thrive if it is fully prepared to act, to the fullest extent, upon one of its historic prime objectives, namely extending solidarity across national boundaries.

There is one characteristic that mineworkers from all over the world have in common: it is their concern for safe working conditions and health.

The statistics of this very Organization indicate that, every year, more than 15,000 miners, that is the population of a small town, lose their lives through mining accidents. The real number, however, including the small-scale sector, may indeed be much higher, perhaps double that.

To us in the Miners International Federation, the fatal and non-fatal accident figures which are higher than comparable figures in any other industry, are shocking, and we believe these sad facts do not have to be accepted as inevitable. Research carried out by the MIF and presented to our Federation's International Conference on Health and Safety in the Mining Industry, which was held two years ago with the support of the ILO, showed that many of these accidents could have been avoided if up-to-date safety standards had been in place, and adhered to.

Miners know that they have dangerous jobs, but they also know that most accidents are avoidable, provided that the best available mine safety techniques are applied. The MIF and its member organizations have always held that the problem is not only a technical one, and that what could best be described as a proper "safety culture" must be developed. Miners and mining communities must be able to participate in the control of their environment and their workplace and where they live.

Since our conference was held, the first moves have been made, nationally and internationally, to get our own programme started, with health and safety seminars and workshops, production of education material, publications and intensive lobbying at all appropriate forums.

The ILO has been a reliable partner in all our efforts to improve safety and health in the mines. The Governing Body of the ILO four years ago pointed out that mining remained one of the most hazardous industries, but complained that no instrument existed to extend international protection to miners. After a number of in-depth consultations between the MIF and the ILO, the Governing Body finally decided at its 254th Session in November 1992 to place on the agenda of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference the question of health and safety in mines.

The relevant report of the Office argues that "both on the surface and underground, miners are experiencing continued heavy loss of life due to problems of occupational safety and health and catastrophic events associated with the unique and constantly changing working environment. The development of an international standard was considered to be important to member States for the following reasons: firstly, because of the value to workers, employers and governments of an instrument or instruments that address areas where existing instruments are deficient and, furthermore, consolidate such standards as do exist for the benefit of the sector-specific regulatory authorities already established in member States. Secondly, the provision of an instrument or instruments would mark the recognition of the considerable economic importance of mining in both industrially developed and emerging countries".

This session of the International Labour Conference coincides with the ILO's 75th anniversary and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. To us these events seem a very appropriate context for preparing to adopt a Convention and a Recommendation on occupational health and safety in mines.

Although we are aware that certain groups within the ILO have become critical of international standards, the events of the recent days at this very Conference have shown that a large majority of employers in the mining industry who took part in the consultations on agenda item V, share our concern for health and safety, and we are pleased at having found a wide consensus concerning the principle that the fate of a miner should not depend on whether the company he works for has a highly developed policy in terms of occupational safety, or has virtually none. To achieve this we do need international standards in our industry.

I hope that all the governments of mining countries, including those who until now have had some reservations concerning the adoption of a clear-cut Convention, will, in the light of the deliberations at this Conference, adopt a positive attitude when it comes to the last reading of the draft instruments at next year's 82nd Session. We have from the early outset made it clear that we wanted a ratifiable and applicable Convention.

Finally, allow me to come back to one of the most important passages in the Report of the Director-General concerning the social clause. We believe that once an international labour standard has been set by this Organization and ratified by a certain country, it should by all means be applied.

What can be wrong with enforcing the application of ILO standards by a clause in international agreements?

If the practice of the future is that countries that violate ILO standards are rewarded by these dubious benefits of the so-called free market, then not only ILO standards are endangered, but the very existence of this Organization.

Original French: Mr. KUBWIMANA (Workers' delegate, Burundi) – I am particularly happy to address this august assembly, in order to first of all carry out a very pleasant duty, that of congratulating the President and the Officers on their unanimous election to direct the work of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. There is no doubt that the trust thus placed in them is a guarantee for the success of our work, for their wisdom and their experience in forums of this kind guided the choice of all of the participants in selecting them.

I must also pay a well-deserved tribute to the Director-General and to the Governing Body of the ILO for the remarkable quality of the Reports which they have submitted to us for discussion, and which have been the subject of continuous praise on the part of all the speakers who have preceded me at this rostrum.

I believe this praise is all the more justified as this year the International Labour Organization had not only to give us an account of the activities of the ILO since the last session of the Conference, but also to give us an assessment covering the 75 years of existence of this prestigious specialized agency of the United Nations and coinciding with the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philidelphia which defined the goals and objectives of the Organization.

This double anniversary also gives us a very valuable opportunity to mutually congratulate ourselves – managers of the ILO system, governments, employers and workers – because of the gigantic task that has been accomplished in the struggle for social peace, human rights in general, trade union rights and freedom of enterprise in particular, as well as security and peace in a world which is continually changing.

While the social partners can take legitimate pride in the various achievements and the progress of the ILO in the fields of social justice, democracy and human rights, this feeling must not hide the new dangers and threats which hang over the same accomplishments and the future of vulnerable social categories.

There is a growing tendency, even within the ILO, to question the standard-setting activities of our Organization. The sacred mission of the member States to ensure that a balance exists between the economic and social interests of the partners in the world of work has also been challenged.

It would not be appropriate at this point in time for the ILO to accept philosophies aimed at diverting it from its mission and which are presented as corollaries of democratization. Unbridled economic liberalism, "flexible" labour markets and the deceptive "social clauses" in economic cooperation agreements, financial and commercial agreements have all been presented in that light.

This is the best forum for the social partners to give in-depth consideration to the very relevant theme proposed by the Director-General of the International Labour Office in the second part of the name of his Report, namely "Social justice in a global economy". The values we must defend through these changes should, for the ILO and its constituents, be more than a mere "project". They represent a wager that must be won at any cost rather than a challenge.

The ILO should become the last bastion of social justice in a world economic environment which is governed increasingly by the harsh rules of competition, that is, the law of the jungle.

If the crucial role of the ILO – that of advising governments, employers and workers in their social and industrial relations – frittered away as the economy became more global, how could our tripartite Organization claim to promote fundamental human rights and to defend social justice?

The ILO has to be more vigilant than ever during this last decade of the twentieth century so that the positive fruits of political democratization are not embezzled by "new bureaucracies" allied with the forces of capital to maintain the social forces on the fringe of world development.

There are no better indicators of this daunting problem than the complaints of occupational organizations of workers and employers denouncing certain governments, which on top of it all call themselves democratic, for having openly interfered in their internal affairs.

How many governments respect the principle of tripartite representation at ILO meetings or in the working committees of regional organizations without making the partners have to go through obstructive procedures to claim, sometimes without success, their statutory and legal rights.

I can cite as an example the case of my country, Burundi, the Government of which was the subject of a denunciation for violation of article 3 of Convention No. 87 in November 1993. To date, no explanation has been given for this violation, in spite of the request which was addressed to it by the competent bodies of the International Labour Office. Similarly, the tripartite composition of the Burundian delegation at this session was only achieved thanks to the joint insistence of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Burundi and the Association of Employers of Burundi.

Apart from the duty of the ILO to defend the fundamental values of social justice and democracy through apparently unavoidable changes, there are also situations which are particularly urgent and which require the kind of solidarity on the part of the international community that the ILO can mobilize.

At this very time, as I speak to you, in the east-central subregion of Africa, a human tragedy is taking place which is unprecedented since the persecution of the Jews by the Nazi empire during the first half of this century.

In our subregion, in particular in Rwanda and Burundi, the democratization process has exacerbated the differences between ethnic groups which had coexisted for thousands of years, rather than galvanizing the national conscience and creative energies into a political, economic, social and cultural environment which would be more beneficial for all.

The genocides which are being perpetrated in these two countries and which the international press modestly calls "inter-ethnic massacres" should bear on every human conscience and on the civilized nations so that they put an end to them without giving rise to an interventionism aimed at reconquering lost or uncontrolled territories.

In addition to mobilizing international opinion to respond with greater human assistance for the peoples of Burundi and Rwanda, the ILO should become more involved in the search for resources for the reconstruction of these two member States, which are at present in dire need and ravaged by civil war.

I appeal, on behalf of the Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Burundi, to the services and decision-making bodies of the ILO to establish urgent assistance programmes for the workers and employers who are victims of the tragic events which have been taking place in Burundi since October 1993, and I also feel that they should establish medium-term projects which could be part of a national reconstruction plan.

The social and political crisis is taking place at the same time as another crisis, which is no less deadly, namely the economic crisis. It has been exacerbated by structural adjustment policies. The international organizations and other partners of Burundi should direct their assistance to reconstruction, the creation of jobs and the improvement of living conditions of populations, both rural and urban, which no longer have any income from agriculture, crafts or other work.

To conclude, I dare to hope that this appeal of the Burundi working class will be heard, and above all that it will be followed by rapid and positive reactions on the part of the ILO and its allies, whom we thank in advance.

May our work conclude with results which will be satisfactory to all participants, and may they genuinely benefit our respective constituents.

Long live the ILO and long live international solidarity.

Mr. RIBIC (Workers' delegate, Croatia) – On behalf of the Croatian workers and their delegation here, I would like to congratulate the President and the Vice-Presidents on their election and successful leadership of this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

We are very proud to take part in this 75th anniversary of the ILO and of having the honour to speak here. The very fact that the Croatian workers are here is also an occasion for rejoicing. For this they can thank the establishment of their independent State, whose liberty has mainly been attained by the efforts and lives of workers. Thanks to their sacrifice in the war against Serbian fascism, they were able last year, for the first time, to attend the Conference and contribute actively to the ILO's high human and social principles.

Their first and ancient dream to have their own national State has been realized; their second pursuit – to live and work in stable peace – is far from being achieved; and their third dream – to have a State and society based on social justice – is still a dream. The Croatian workers hope that the ILO will help to make this dream come true and promote the effective protection of its own standards and instruments – which are more important than ever, for the prosperity of each individual.

In the war tragedy Croatian workers have experienced the inefficient nature of the international community, which has only paid lip-service to its highest principles of human rights. Indeed, ILO Conventions have been violated, tripartism overthrown and social dialogue thwarted; and all this undermines the ILO's authority to protect its profound values.

Consequently, a shadow of pessimism has been cast on those world institutions whose goals extend beyond purely economic considerations and whose existence is based on the protection of human values.

There is a real threat that only one criterion will determine the quality of our social life – the economic criterion. This threat could result in a denial of basic human values, such as social justice, tripartism, solidarity, tolerance and education. Some of these values have always had their price. Therefore, we must ask ourselves: at what stage do these values put a brake on economic development; and when can the overriding need for economic growth justify our neglect of basic ideals and values? Can the "law of the jungle" prevail and nullify social and democratic achievements that have been acquired during the twentieth century – including the invaluable contribution of the ILO?

There is no doubt that the ILO should continue protecting and promoting basic social principles in spite of the pressure of a rough neo-liberalism. We believe that ILO conventions cannot become a "soft law". We believe that there is no alternative to tripartism and to collective bargaining. All of these items should be enshrined in a world charter of workers' rights; they should be considered as part of a human being's birthright. We believe that they do not have an economic equivalent – just as free elections in democratic societies do not have a price either.

We maintain that the growth of international competition, the globalization of economy and broad opening of the world markets cannot justify the decline or postponement of the sustained application of our values. On the contrary, these phenomena call out for the global standardization of social rights. If the global economy erases many of the differences existing between national regulations, the argument that the implementation of ILO standards runs counter to specific national conditions seems totally unconvincing to us.

The global economic crisis must not be used as an excuse to slow down on the implementation of our standards. We sometimes hear it said that now is not the time to be observing ILO standards. We assert that by this assumption everybody can easily understand that there never has been an appropriate time – neither today, nor in the future: there never will be, if we live in a market economy, undergoing the rules of economic competition. Such opinions undermine the universal principles contained in international labour standards, which are not only prescribed for periods of economic prosperity.

Social justice was not devised as an ideal that cannot survive an economic crisis. If social justice loses its intrinsic meaning and universal nature, then the ILO will have lost its raison d'être. It will then have to abandon the most important provision in the Declaration of Philadelphia, that "labour is not a commodity"; and after that our world will have changed and be quite different from the world we believed in.

Therefore, the ILO should prove to the world community that it is the social conscience of the world, quite able to answer to the task of defending values and promoting change. The World Summit for Social Development is the place where the ILO should reaffirm its basic values and the social clause. We agree with the Director-General's proposals to: reinforce supervision of the respect of basic social rights; draft an annual report on the world employment situation and adopt a multilateral approach.

Workers' representatives inside the ILO should participate in ILO policy-making, helping to reach more convincing solutions to various issues: the right to work; labour law; fair labour standards and international trade. Our first task is to make it clearly understood that strict compliance with ILO standards cannot be a real obstacle to employment creation.

Croatian workers in the country are also in a similar situation. We are not experiencing a crisis of tripartism because we do not have tripartism. It has not been established as a mechanism for social dialogue. We do not even have a formal structure for tripartism. Similarly, we have not resumed the system of collective bargaining. The Croatian Government, as the largest employer in the country, does not wish to bargain collectively in good faith with the unions. The unions have been ignored for a long time, particularly in the public services.

Resuming with the sharp anti-inflation and economic stabilization programme last October, the Government decided to regulate wages by decrees. For the first four months, unions supported the new economic programme. Owing to the unions' support, the programme was very successful indeed. For eight months, there has been no inflation, although the country has a very unstable external environment.

However, the Government cut salaries unequally, sharply reducing the wages of employees paid under the state budget, adopted decrees and refused to resume bargaining; not surprisingly, this provoked a few strikes in the educational sector.

The strikes were interrupted on the grounds that teachers were obliged to work under the Act of Defence. The Government justified this decision by maintaining that the country was in a state of direct danger.

It is undeniable that 25 per cent of the country is occupied by Serbian fascists, that Croatia has more than 200,000 refugees, that war is being waged in a neighbouring country and that part of Croatian industry is destroyed.

However, we do not believe that teachers' strikes can constitute a direct danger to the country. We maintain that the failure of the Government to observe its democratic duties towards the unions has undermined its authority. We believe that it has violated the ILO's basic Conventions Nos. 87 and 98.

The ILO Committee on Freedom of Association will assess the case in accordance with the ILO's role, which is of crucial importance for the development of democratic and social rights all over the world; and this role can never be overestimated.

(Mr. Matinchev takes the Chair.)

Original Spanish: Mr. PENINO (Employers' delegate, Uruguay) – It is an honour for me to take the floor at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

On behalf of the Chamber of Industries of Uruguay I wish to extend to the President the congratulations of the employers of the Eastern Republic of Uruguay on his election for the delicate task of chairing this session of the Conference.

There can be no doubt that the subject chosen by the Director-General for his Report was the most suitable in view of the totally unprecedented events we have witnessed in recent years.

Among these are the irreversible adoption of the market economy by a constantly growing number of countries in which structural adjustment policies are promoting private enterprise and reducing state intervention in the economy.

The market economy, synonymous with democracy and freedom requires a legal framework which recognizes private property as well as the right for industry to operate freely and to trade in the form of private enterprises.

The globalization of the economy and the creation of regional entities aimed at lowering trade barriers and establishing areas of free trade, make it necessary for some countries to apply structural adjustment programmes in order to improve the competitiveness of enterprises and their capacity for accessing international markets.

Economic and social development is the result of conditions that stimulate profitability and increased productivity, and of the growth of productive undertakings based on private initiative and investment.

Under these conditions it is essential to redefine the role of the State in the order of economic relations with a clear statement of the changes that must be made in the system of labour relations in order to bring it into line with the goals of the democratic institutional system which itself aims at achieving both political freedom and prosperity for the people.

Thus, for example, in our region at the same time as MERCOSUR is being planned on the basis of the liberalization and deregulation of economic relations, parallel to this, and in the very same bodies that are set up to this end, proposals are being made which are aimed at generalizing and standardizing the field of labour, as well as the functioning of the labour market, all of which is incompatible with the very idea of the free market.

What is needed is labour reform providing for both flexibility at the level of individual relations and management of human resources at the level of the enterprise, as well as the framing and implementation of a system of collective labour relations in those areas in which the necessary conditions exist based on free and voluntary negotiations.

We should clearly state that the imposing of standards which concretely determine the terms under which collective agreements are negotiated and implemented is inappropriate, leaving no room for the free play of those variables which affect the labour market and the necessary autonomy in enterprise management.

Labour flexibility merely means to recover conditions of freedom, adaptability and the capacity to respond to the changing requirements and the reality of the economy – recognition of the authority of employers to manage enterprises in efficient conditions in the framework of free competition.

In order for collective bargaining to constitute a system that is consistent with the basic principles of the democratic system of government and political freedom in general, as well as freedom of association in particular, we must have collective bargaining that is voluntary, free and autonomous, both with regard to negotiation itself, and the content of the collective agreements, and which allows genuine verification of the level of effective participation by all sides.

The collective labour agreement, therefore, should play the role belonging to it, namely expressing the balance between the parties prevailing at the time it is signed, by means of which both parties, employers and trade unions, assume their responsibilities.

For such a system to function effectively a precise legal reference framework is essential. It is up to legislation to define tangibly the nature of the collective agreement, the temporary nature of its influence on individual contractual terms, its duration or termination in the event that the trade union fails to adhere to its inherent obligation to respect the conflictual commitment made by virtue of the agreement.

Labour relations under a democratic system can only have a collective form in those areas in which the collective autonomy is expressed through the establishment of broad-based workers' and employers' organizations.

The concept of social bargaining as a series of operations going from the macroeconomic level through successive stages to the microeconomic level is clearly a corporate concept based on a regulatory view of labour relations which is totally incompatible with the market economy and the principles of freedom.

Centralized negotiations of a type often called "national agreements" can be useful to the extent in which they are a means of ensuring the consensual application of a system of collective bargaining that is both free and voluntary, ensures transparency in the real collective capabilities of the respective actors, will contribute to social and economic progress through labour flexibility and provides security with regard to labour standards both at the administrative and legal level.

According to the democratic republican representative system of government that prevails in my country it is incumbent on the political organs of the State, namely the Legislature and the Executive to assume the task of drawing up labour legislation in terms that without diminishing protection for the workers against possible abuse guarantees the employer the freedom needed to manage the enterprise's human resources.

The Judiciary must also ensure legal protection based on the direct interpretation of the law, guarding against extensive interpretations that are not within the grasp of the average citizen whose conduct they govern.

In the final analysis, the validity of democratic principles, the possibilities for economic development and the true application of human rights in the field of labour relations all depend on the definitive repudiation of intervention and on replacing it with a system of genuine autonomy in employment relationships both at the individual and the collective level.

Mr. BAFYAU (Workers' delegate, Nigeria) – On behalf of Nigerian workers and their trade unions, may I congratulate the President on his election to the chair of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference. We wish him a very successful tenure.

May I also seize this opportunity to congratulate not only Mr. Nelson Mandela and the humane and courageous minds that kept the struggle alive against apartheid in South Africa, but also the ILO for the role it played in seeing that South Africa is a truly democratic nation. We hope, however, that the political democracy won in South Africa will equally transform the economic fortunes of all races in South Africa.

In extending the above appreciation and best wishes to the people of South Africa, we are fully aware of the fact that Nigeria is under a military dictatorship, and Nigerian workers and their trade unions are, of course, determined and are involved in a relentless struggle to ensure that democracy returns to our country very soon. We are very confident that the date on which these objectives are achieved is not distant.

Permit me to comment on the Director-General's Report and his seeming support for the globalization of world economy and preference for the market economy. To us in the developing countries, the market economy is clearly a grand strategy by the developed nations to perpetually enslave developing countries, socially and economically.

Standards of development and characteristics differ from one country to the other. The conditionalities and terms imposed by the World Bank, the IMF and other international finance agencies on the developing countries have not only destroyed and devalued their national currencies, but have also effectively killed productivity, pauperized workers and made developing countries almost totally dependent on developed nations. This is an international operation.

It also has to be said that the implementation of these conditionalities has led to gross inflation in all commodities in these countries, low capacity utilization in industries, massive retrenchments in all sectors of the economy and of course instability in governments. That is why any insurrection in the developing countries is closely linked to the economic performance of that country as a result of implementing the structural adjustment programme.

This brings me to the concern expressed in the Report of the Director-General over the employment situation in the world. Unemployment in developing countries is almost at a crisis point. The cause of this is directly associated with the market economic conditionalities clamped on the developing countries. No country can pay back huge debts in hard currencies and at the same time liberalize trade in their homes and be expected to make economic and political progress. Whereas the developed nations have opportunities to plan their economies, they do not want the countries of the Third World to plan theirs. Whereas they preach gainful employment here in the ILO, they preach rationalization of workers in industries in the Third World, all, according to them, to assist efficiency. Who is fooling who? We are today in a world where the international financial institutions are strangulating the Third World with their heavy debt burdens and high vending interest rates on one side, and manipulation and economic exploitation by multinationals on the other side. We cannot talk in an honest manner about unemployment if the ILO cannot come out and intervene decisively in the activities of the IMF, the World Bank and the international financial institutions and the conditionalities that they are imposing on the developing countries.

It is a matter of joy to see that the Director-General has put emphasis on the matter of tripartism in his Report. It is through this forum that we hope that the issue of retraining retrenched workers can be adequately discussed. Multinationals and employers of labour in developing countries never see the need to retrain workers for other jobs when they are retrenched. We therefore call on the ILO to send a clear message to employers not only to urge that workers are retrained for higher responsibilities but also to ensure that employers examine ways and means of finding alternative employment for retrenched workers.

In conclusion, I wish to draw the attention of the ILO to the need to intensify worker training programmes in our country, Nigeria. To achieve the necessary mental environment among Nigerian workers for the constructive struggle for durable democracy, as advocated by the Director-General in his Report, trade unions need to carry out massive training programmes of workers. This is equally necessary in almost all developing countries of the world in order to sustain their democracy.

And finally, Nigerian workers and their trade unions congratulate Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization for their engagement in essential dialogue in order to bring decades of hostilities to an end.

Original Laotian: Mr. VANNABOUATHONG (Workers' adviser, Lao People's Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the Lao Federation of Trade Unions of the Lao People's Democratic Republic, I feel very honoured to participate in the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in this beautiful city of Geneva. I would like to thank the organizing committee for having provided us with the opportunity to express our opinion on the theme issues. We congratulate the Director-General on the selection of the issues to be reported on to the Conference, in particular the important issue of part-time work. I am convinced that you are satisfied with what has been achieved.

With more than 80,000 members throughout the country, the Lao Federation of Trade Unions is a large, popular organization which protects the interests of and represents the Lao workers and labourers in the Lao People's Democratic Republic. These members represent the core of the organization and set a good example for the workers and labourers. The Lao Federation of Trade Unions comprises seven main branches, 24 autonomous grass-roots bodies, 16 provincial trade union federations and one municipal trade union office. The Federation plays a role in educating, uniting and mobilizing the workers to participate in the defence of the rights of all workers without any discrimination, and in protecting their just rights and interests according to the state law. The strategic tasks of the Lao Federation of Trade Unions during the transitional period of socio-economic development in the Lao People's Democratic Republic are to stimulate the movement of workers and labourers and to actively contribute to the implementation of the Lao Government's socio-economic development plan which has been approved by the National Assembly. We strive to build a prosperous country and to gradually improve the living conditions of working people. We also make a contribution to the observance of regulations and state laws to ensure social order.

Through the monitoring and stimulation of the implementation of various laws related to the interests of workers and labourers, the Lao Federation of Trade Unions is especially concerned with labour law. Thus, together with the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare and the Ministry of Justice, the Lao Federation of Trade Unions studies labour law and makes suggestions for amendments to suit the present conditions of labour. A new labour law was endorsed by the National Assembly on 14 April 1994 and will soon be enforced by the Government. The labour law is a tool to protect the interests of employers and employees and to mediate their labour disputes, in conformity with the spirit of the fundamental ILO principles which the Lao Government endorsed in 1964.

The issue of part-time work assigned for a second discussion by the Conference is of great interest to our delegation since it is crucial to national construction and development and helps reduce unemployment in the country. According to our labour law, working hours amount to 48 hours a week or eight hours a day. Part-time work is allowed at some production units for the convenience of the workers concerned, but it is not available to all production units since our country is still underdeveloped. Ninety per cent of the Lao people are engaged in agriculture and in handicraft production. They have their own land and houses. Agriculture and handicrafts are also ways of generating additional income for government officials and employees after their work.

To cope with our huge responsibilities, we still need comprehensive assistance. In particular, technical and financial assistance in the field of skill development, staff training in legal labour protection and information systems are badly needed. We wish to obtain technical assistance in the form of consultation, provision of experts and necessary materials, and personnel training.

The Lao Federation of Trade Unions is very pleased to extend and strengthen our cooperation with all trade unions in Asia, as well as throughout the world, without any discrimination and on the principle of respect for independence, sovereignty, equality and mutual benefit.

In conclusion, we would like to express our sincere thanks to the International Labour Organization and the organizing committee for providing us with the opportunity to attend this Conference. I would like to wish delegates and guests good health, and the Conference great success.

Mr. SHAMENDA (Workers' delegate, Zambia) – On behalf of the Zambian workers' delegation, I wish to offer our sincere congratulations to the President and his two distinguished Vice-Presidents on their election to these very important offices.

I would like to pay tribute to the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, for his thought-provoking Report to this Conference, which also marks the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. These two occasions should encourage us to reflect and see in which direction we are going, whether we are taking three steps forward and four steps back. The Report entitled Defending values, promoting change underscores the main principles of the foundation of this noble Organization 75 years ago.

It is important that we defend, maintain, retain and improve on the values which we struggled to achieve over the difficult 75 years of the ILO's existence. Promoting change – this should mean change for the better. The workers are worried by the attitude of some of our employers and governments – on the African continent in particular – who are taking away even the few privileges that were previously granted to the workers. There are speeches every year from some employers and some governments at the ILO who are trying to dilute the basic standards which were granted to the workers of the world. The workers of my country, believe that, given its historical background, mandate, expertise, long experience and tripartite structure, the ILO has a determining role to play in any effort to ensure that the benefits of expanded trade and economic growth are shared by the majority of the workers. We therefore strongly support the Director-General's point that the launching of the World Trade Organization and the globalization of the world economy have made it more important and imperative that this Conference should give the Director-General a clear mandate for the further development of the ideas contained in his Report on how the World Trade Organization and the ILO can work together at improving our common objectives in improving labour conditions for a better quality of human life and the promotion of social justice, as articulated in the Preamble of the ILO's Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia 50 years ago.

In my country, Zambia, despite many promises by our Government on the introduction of economic reforms with a human face, it is sad to note that this beautiful face is covered with an ugly mask. The social dimensions of the reforms are non-existent. When you talk about development, development should be for the improvement of the quality of life for the majority of the people. If development means measuring the affluence of 3 per cent of our citizens, then we are highly developed.

When my country achieved independence some 30 years ago, we had 4 million people and close to 200,000 to 300,000 people in formal employment. Thirty years later, with a population of 8 million, we have dropped below 200,000 people in formal employment. Is this the economic reform that the world should be preaching? Is this the development that we look forward to? Even if we have no more political headaches and are fully enjoying the new wind of democracy, our democracy is once again being in danger of becoming a sham. Citizens are faced with a high rate of unemployment; the majority of our people are now living in poverty; industries are closing down every day, resulting in the loss of jobs in the country with no social protection for the unemployed. Without economic development, we cannot talk about any meaningful political development or democracy. As a result, there is a danger of leaving the political arena to the few who have the affluence to control the livelihood of the majority of our people. What is democracy to a person who has got no employment? What is democracy to a person who is not certain of what he is going to eat tomorrow? It is another form of dictatorship.

I would like to thank the Director-General, for having sent his Assistant Director-General in charge of Africa, to Zambia to participate in our May Day celebrations. I am sure he saw misery and helplessness of the workers who were marching on this very important day. As workers, we believe that real development will only take place through meaningful consultation among the three social partners, and the ILO can play a key role in this area.

Human rights should not be confined to political reforms and political rhetoric. The issue of human dignity through economic development and well-being of all citizens, as articulated in the Declaration of Philadelphia should be considered in the same way as other forms of human rights. Therefore, the issue of social clause is a must for the workers all over the world who believe in social justice.

At this point I would like to pay special tribute to the South African Government for having accepted tripartism in the Southern African Labour Commission. I further pay tribute to them and the employers' organizations in our subregion for having adopted the Workers' Charter. I have no doubt that having ratified this Charter both the governments and employers in our subregion will give their support to the proposed social clause.

Allow me in conclusion to pay tribute to the South African delegation, following their recent admission to membership of the ILO. For the workers of Zambia the victory in South Africa is also their victory. We used to be subjected to the same evils whenever we visited our relatives and friends in that great country. We are part of them and they are part of us. So we celebrate together. Their presence should always remind us of the evils of social and human injustice that the ILO has vigorously fought against for the past 20 years. This should never again emerge in any country in whatever form to be discussed at the ILO. Let us defend our values and promote change in order to enhance the dignity and quality of human life and promote social justice for the majority of our people.

Allow me to end with an old Ghanaian proverb: The ruin of a nation begins in the homes of its people.

Mr. PASKA (Workers' delegate, Papua New Guinea) – It not only gives me pleasure but also considerable pride to congratulate Mr. Gray on his election as the President of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

That an American labour leader known throughout the developing world as a champion of the cause of the workers has assumed the high status of President of this Conference, which marks the 75th anniversary of the ILO, is also a fitting tribute to the pioneering labour leaders who founded not only the ILO but also its uniquely tripartite structure.

So many encomiums have been heaped on the ILO by previous speakers that it would be merely an exercise in backtracking if I were to repeat the praises of the ILO. Suffice it to say that I fully endorse the compliments given to the ILO by speakers who took the rostrum before me, and also that as a tangible manifestation of our regard for the ILO and the service it has rendered to the world of labour, the Government of Papua New Guinea declared 10 June as a public holiday to honour the ILO. As the representative of workers in my country I hope that my Government will follow the rest of the world in declaring 1 May as a regular holiday in my country.

As a further acknowledgement of the crucial role played by the ILO during the 75 years of its existence, the Government had responded to trade union initiatives and set up a national tripartite consultative council charged with the task of formulating labour-related policies and programmes. However, the full potential of the national tripartite consultative councils has not been exploited on account of a number of variables. We have submitted memoranda in this regard and we are hopeful that the Government will respond to our overtures positively.

This Conference has assumed more than ordinary interest as the Director-General has covered a wide array of topical issues currently riveting the attention of the global community. Among them is the key issue relating to the social clause of the GATT, leading towards the World Trade Organization. The question of human rights, structural adjustment programmes and their repercussions are all interlinked to constitute yet another great divide in the world.

Whilst the acceleration of globalization has been brought into sharp focus by the Director-General, the fact remains that divisive wages continue to open up chasms based on conceptual differences regarding development in the developing countries. Thus, we see the North-South, the East-West, the poor and the affluent, the developed and the developing countries being bequeathed with a further legacy – the social clause.

It is now clear that there is a great deal of suspicion on the part of the developing countries about the true import of the social clause. It is seen as an attempt to promote protectionist policies and halt the developmental progress of Third World countries. Therefore, I believe that a special effort must be made to allay such misgivings and to devise a formula that will be transparent and easily discernible.

As a result of structural adjustment policies that countries like ours do not have the option of accepting or not accepting, we have had consequences that have acted to the detriment of the workers and the less affluent.

The rubber stamping of the economic medicines prescribed by the IMF and the World Bank has seriously depressed the living standards of the workers. Regulation and economic liberalization have reduced the take-home pay of the workers. The social cost of this is of ominous dimensions.

All this points to the more effective and more dynamic role that the ILO must play not only to maintain its distinctive character and the scope and content of its outreach stemming from the 75 years of its existence, but also to re-establish the ILO as the fountain-head of the social concerns of the nations which constitute the global community.

Before concluding, I wish to confess my puzzlement over the Director-General's reference to the fall of Communism and its impact on the work of the ILO. Similarly, the reference to the Declaration of Philadelphia and the beginning of the Cold War appears to give the impression that the establishment of the ILO was a response to the advent of Communism and the Declaration of Philadelphia a countermeasure of the Cold War. I trust that this misunderstanding will be cleared up by the Director-General in due course.

I submit that the collapse of Communism and the end of the Cold War have not lessened or in any way reduced the paradoxes facing the world. In place of these ideologies new fissures have developed that are tearing unitary nations apart by a rise in sectoral interests.

Therefore, it cannot be said that the ILO's basic concerns can be relaxed or that it should demarcate for itself a new direction to in which proceed alone.

Current developments dictate that the United Nations system itself must align itself to the successful formula in the make-up of the ILO. If other intergovernmental agencies designed to give recognition to the social partners, I believe that it would be possible to introduce structural changes with due regard for social costs.

Finally, I wish to convey to the President and the other distinguished delegates attending the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference greetings from the workers of Papua New Guinea. I also wish to extend congratulations from the workers of my country to the people of South Africa for their victory over apartheid. It goes without saying that their victory was as much a victory for the workers, through the collective efforts and sacrifices of trade unions, as it was for the world and for mankind.

Original Arabic: Mr. TABET (Employers' delegate, Yemen) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have pleasure in congratulating Mr. Charles Gray on his election to the Chair of this Conference. I also wish to congratulate the ILO on behalf of the employers of my country, the Republic of Yemen, on the 75th anniversary of its foundation and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. In addition, I should like to welcome the delegation from our brother country, the Sultanate of Oman, and also Tajikistan and South Africa who have recently joined the Organization.

I also congratulate the Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Michel Hansenne, on this special occasion and thank him for this year's Report entitled Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

We share the views that he set forth in the Report and commend his deep understanding of the needs of the member States of the Organization, especially in the light of the changing political and economic circumstances, and his policy of encouraging the defence of values and social justice in the world economy. We believe that social development, the creation of employment opportunities and general economic development are bound up with the existence of active enterprises, which require flexible labour standards and general stability as an aid to development.

We further believe that government policies should focus on improving balance and economic competition and on strengthening cooperation among social groups, since this leads to the type of growth on which economic development and social justice are based.

Thanks to the ending of ideological conflict in the world, the new international circumstances and the efforts and struggle of the Yemeni people, the unity of Yemen was achieved, inspiring us with great hope for participation based on democratic principles in order to share in development and the achievement of social justice and peace.

At the same time, we Yemeni employers feel that obstacles to the achievement of full democracy exist and are impeding growth.

In this connection, we believe that the ILO should take steps to assist the neediest countries through advice and options so that they can make appropriate choices with a view to eliminating the causes and circumstances that are impeding development and social progress.

In conclusion, I should like, on behalf of the employers of my country, to reiterate our thanks to the ILO, its regional office in the Arab region and the Assistant Director-General Mr. Shukri Zaki al-Dajani, for their continued valiant efforts to improve the quality of life.

I also thank the International Organization of Employers for its assistance and determination to bring about a market economy and to develop the role of private enterprise in the world economy.

Mr. WOEWIYU (Minister of Labour, Liberia) – I would like to congratulate the President and other elected Officers of the Conference on their election. It is an honour and a privilege that I have made it through the will of God to this rostrum during the last hours of this historic Conference of the ILO.

As you all know, Liberia has been embroiled in one of the most devastating civil wars in the history of Africa. Please bear with me for deviating from the protocol of addressing broader and global labour issues because the current situation in our country leaves us with no alternative but to concentrate our efforts on the survival of our country.

I came straight from the airport and our mission at the very last hour of this historic Conference of the ILO is, first, to express the commitment of the Government and the people of Liberia to all the Conventions and resolutions adopted by this Conference; second, to confer with leaders of this Organization regarding the active participation of the ILO in the institutional reconstruction of the Republic of Liberia, especially the labour sector. ILO technical assistance will be very very essential during this critical period of reconstruction, if Liberia is to maintain her commitment to internationally accepted labour standards.

On behalf of the Liberian national transitional government and the people of the Republic of Liberia, I again express our profound congratulations to the ILO on its 75th anniversary.

Original French: The PRESIDENT (Mr. MATINCHEV) – We have concluded our discussion of the Reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General. I wish to thank all the speakers who have participated in the debate.

4. The Committee held ten sittings. It had before it Reports IV(1), IV(2A) and IV(2B), prepared by the Office on the fourth item of the agenda of the Conference: "Part-time work".

Introduction

5. The representative of the Secretary-General presented Reports IV(1), IV(2A) and IV(2B), which had been prepared by the Office to serve as a basis for the Committee's second discussion on part-time work. The first discussion, which had taken place in June 1993, had led to the adoption of conclusions. On the basis of these and in accordance with article 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the International Labour Office had prepared and transmitted to the governments of member States, and through them to national organizations of workers and employers, Report IV(1) which contained a draft Convention and a draft Recommendation on part-time work. The governments had been requested to transmit their comments on the draft instruments to the Office. On the basis of the replies received, the Office had prepared Reports IV(2A) and IV(2B). Sixty-seven governments had replied on time, of which 20 had stated that they had taken into account the comments of national organizations of employers and workers. Separate replies had been received from 27 national employers' organizations and from 22 national workers' organizations. A number of replies had been received too late to be incorporated in the reports, but could be consulted in the Secretariat.

6. The representative of the Secretary-General reported that Report IV(2B) contained the texts of the draft instruments basically as the Committee had agreed during the first discussion. Modifications by the Office were few and primarily editorial. However, the Office had expressed in Report IV(2A) some reservations about several provisions of the draft instruments and hoped that particular care would be taken when reviewing them.

7. The representative of the Secretary-General then commented on the replies received from governments and employers' and workers' organizations highlighting the outstanding issues of debate. There continued to be opposing views on the form that the proposed new standards should take. Certain governments and the employers' organizations either had remained opposed to any international regulation on part-time work or had supported only the adoption of a sufficiently flexible Recommendation. Other governments and the workers' organizations had confirmed their support for the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. In contrast with employers' organizations, workers' organizations had criticized the draft instruments for not going far enough in protecting part-time workers.

8. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled the debate during the Committee's first discussion on the definition of part-time worker. It was only after in-depth consultations that a compromise text had been unanimously adopted. The relevance of the compromise text had been largely confirmed by the replies and was therefore retained with only minor editorial changes. It was found in Article 1 of the draft Convention and Paragraph 2 of the draft Recommendation.

9. During the Committee's first discussion, a number of difficulties had been encountered concerning the possibility envisaged in Article 3 of excluding from the scope of the Convention particular categories of workers or establishments when its application to them would raise particular problems of a substantial nature. Other problems had concerned the exclusion set out in Article 8 of part-time workers from the protection envisaged under Articles 6 and 7 when their earnings or hours of work were below specified thresholds. The opinions voiced against these exclusions came mainly from workers' organizations, which considered them to be too broad and called either for their elimination or amendment to limit the number of workers or establishments concerned. While the principle of setting threshold requirements for access to social security schemes had appeared to be generally accepted, the wisdom of setting thresholds for maternity protection, termination of employment, paid annual leave and paid holidays had been contested. Workers' organizations in particular had challenged such exclusions. The Office had not amended the text adopted during the Committee's first discussion, but in its comments on Article 8 had questioned the soundness of excluding part-time women workers from maternity protection. It was hoped that this issue would be given due consideration. Finally, in view of the ambiguity of the text adopted on basic wage, the Office had proposed an alternative text, which had been supported by the majority of governments and many employers' and workers' organizations. This constituted Article 5 of the draft Convention. The workers' organizations maintained that the equality of treatment envisaged in this Article should not be restricted to the basic wage, but should apply to other elements of remuneration as well.

10. About the proposed Recommendation, which consisted of a catalogue of suggested measures to guide national action and was not legally binding, the representative of the Secretary-General reported that the replies received had identified a number of problems for some. For example, the employers' organizations had expressed serious reservations about adaptations of statutory social security schemes and the private occupational schemes which complement or supplement them, particularly as regards the proposal to gradually reduce the thresholds for coverage by these schemes. They considered that such measures would increase the cost to employers of part-time workers and would therefore be an obstacle to their recruitment. Workers' organizations had continued to insist that Paragraph 1 of the Recommendation should state that the provisions of the Recommendation should be applied, and not simply "considered", in conjunction with the Convention. They strongly opposed Paragraph 20, under which part-time workers could be given less weight than full-time workers where obligations on employers depended on the number of their employees.

General discussion

11. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the position of the Employers' members as it had been stated to the Conference at the conclusion of the first discussion. He emphasized the importance of part-time employment and the opportunities which it offered for both employers and workers. It was a form of employment which gave many workers greater freedom of choice as to their working arrangements and was of particular significance for certain categories of the workforce, including women. The flexibility of part-time work constituted its greatest advantage. However, it was this flexibility which would be detracted from by the adoption of an international instrument. In this context, he drew attention to a number of provisions in the conclusions which required further consideration. These included the following: the definition of part-time worker; social security; consultation prior to the introduction or extension of part-time working arrangements, changes in agreed working schedules, the transfer of employees from full-time to part-time work; and provisions concerning the basic wage and financial compensation. Moreover, he regretted that the question of the promotion of part-time work, which had been included in the mandate set by the Governing Body, had not been adequately covered in the text adopted by the Committee the previous year.

12. Coming into the second discussion, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson raised the question of what had changed since the first discussion. He emphasized the particular significance of part-time work at a time when, in almost all the countries of the world, unemployment continued to be the major social and political problem. Almost all governments and international organizations, including the ILO, had placed the reduction of unemployment and the creation of jobs at the top of their policy agenda. Governments and international organizations were all coming to realize that flexibility in the labour market was one of the keys to job creation and that over-regulation of the labour market had a negative effect on employment levels. It was therefore necessary to raise a fundamental question. Would the adoption of international labour standards on part-time work have a negative or a positive effect on job creation? He called on all of the members of the Committee, and particularly the Government members of developing countries, to consider the answer to this question very carefully. Considering that the answer to the question could only be that the effects would be negative, the Employers' members had decided to firmly oppose the adoption of a Convention on part-time work. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson particularly urged the Government members of the Committee to weigh the issue with due care and to give voice to their opinions, rather than abstaining, as some had done the previous year. He hoped that the position adopted by the Employers' members against a Convention would be seen in a positive way. The Employers' members were greatly concerned by the issues of employment creation and flexibility. They were not opposed to fair treatment for part-time workers, but believed that the subject would be better dealt with at the national level. The Employers' members were prepared to support adoption of a Recommendation on part-time work, which could make a useful contribution in guiding the social partners towards the objective of fair treatment for part-time workers.

13. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee of the questions that she had raised in her final speech before the Conference in the previous year. Had the standard-setting role of the ILO become obsolete? Were there no longer important issues to be regulated to protect workers the world over? The answer to both of these questions was and remained a resounding no. Employers and some governments, neo-liberal politicians and, in a recent report, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) had maintained that rigidities and a lack of adaptability to new conditions were the main factors leading to mass unemployment; flexibility was seen as a key to creating more jobs. The fundamental weakness with these arguments was that they equated flexibility and deregulation. But regulation, through the adoption of clear and simple rules, provided a basis of security and protection which could be instrumental in increasing the willingness of workers to be flexible. This was the fundamental issue in relation to part-time work. When it was freely chosen and entered into under conditions which were comparable to those of full-time workers, part-time work offered an additional option on the labour market, at least in countries where the standard of living was sufficiently high to allow workers a choice between higher wages and devoting more time to their family or to education. Part-time work had to be freely chosen, not forced upon workers. Good conditions and adequate protection would encourage workers to opt for part-time employment. Protection was therefore one of the best promotional measures for freely chosen part-time work and the labour market flexibility which it provided. This protection was even more important in the developing countries, where measures were needed to prevent workers falling below the poverty line through unilateral reductions in their working hours.

14. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson added that the convocation of the United Nations Social Summit emphasized the clear connection between poverty, employment and security. Indeed, in some quarters it was maintained that the threat of nuclear warfare had been replaced by the risk of the explosion of a social bomb which could destroy society. Social issues needed to be given top priority if peace and security, the principal goals of the United Nations, were to be achieved. One of the contributions that the ILO could make to social justice would be to develop a modern and topical standard on part-time work which was becoming increasingly important in both developing and industrialized countries. Standards were not a rigidity and barrier to development. The Committee's discussions the previous year had produced very flexible texts for a Convention and Recommendation, though in many cases they were too flexible. While the workers would accept flexibility and ready-made solutions for varying situations, the basic principles of protection needed to be maintained.

15. A number of Government members addressed the issue of the form that the proposed new standards should take. Speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Greece, France, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, the Government member of Greece recognized the growing importance of part-time work in response to the needs of both employers and workers. This was a favourable development in so far as it contributed to greater flexibility. Part-time work created greater opportunities for employers to react to the demands of new technologies, the globalization of economies and new consumer preferences. For many men and women, freely chosen part-time work provided new opportunities to reconcile professional and personal or family aspirations. At a time of high unemployment, part-time work also increased employment possibilities. In this context, the promotion of work-sharing was an essential component of the labour market policies of many governments. However, part-time work could only be advantageous to all parties if it was recognized by both workers and employers as one of the normal available forms of productive employment. Minimum standards of protection were needed to obtain this acceptance. It was a globally valid principle that these standards should apply to the same or comparable work, regardless of whether the labour contract was established on a full- or part-time basis. A sufficiently flexible Convention which could be widely ratified should therefore be adopted.

16. The Government member of the United States also believed that the Committee should adopt a simple, flexible and widely ratifiable Convention, supplemented by a more detailed Recommendation to provide guidance on part-time work. The Government member of Canada agreed that a Convention and Recommendation should be adopted on this highly topical subject, which affected a growing number of workers, particularly women, not only in the industrialized countries. To increase its prospects for ratification and implementation, the Convention should focus on broad basic principles of protection, but be sufficiently flexible. The Government member of Sweden added that workers with family responsibilities, and especially women, often resorted to part-time work to reconcile their professional and family obligations. He therefore welcomed the reference in the Preamble of the proposed instruments to the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156), and reminded the Committee of the relevance to part-time work of its accompanying Recommendation (No. 165) which referred to part-time work. Although the Government member of Sweden had expressed opposition to the adoption of a Convention on part-time work during the Committee's discussion the previous year, this attitude had been determined largely by a fear that it might prejudice the protection afforded to part-time workers under other ILO Conventions. The wording of the conclusions adopted by the Committee the previous year, including references to other international labour standards, had alleviated these fears. The Government of Sweden now supported the draft Convention and Recommendation.

17. The Government members of Argentina, Cyprus, Morocco and Turkey also supported the adoption of both a Convention and a Recommendation on part-time work. The Government member of Argentina considered that the establishment of minimum standards on part-time work would assist in the harmonization of legal provisions which was necessitated by the process of integration in many areas, such as with MERCOSUR in South America. The Government member of Cyprus observed that part-time work was a phenomenon which could not be ignored. It was useful to have standards in the form of a Convention covering basic principles and protection, supplemented by a Recommendation, on this form of employment, not only for the industrialized countries but also for developing countries where part-time work was not yet widespread, but would develop in the future.

18. The Government member of the United Kingdom opposed the adoption of international labour standards on part-time work. She considered that part-time work was important for employers and workers and that it offered considerable economic and social benefits. Part-time and other flexible working patterns should therefore be promoted. However, this would not be achieved by the adoption of international labour standards. The proposed instruments would run directly against the interests of employers and would have the effect of adding to labour costs without enhancing productivity and of reducing labour market flexibility and competitiveness. Standards would therefore discourage employers from creating part-time jobs and would jeopardize existing part-time employment. The United Kingdom had one of the lowest levels of restrictions on types of employment in the European Union and was one of those with the highest proportion of the population in employment. It also had the most even spread of employment between men and women and the various age groups in the European Union. The long-term unemployment rate in the United Kingdom was also among the lowest in the European Union. If the majority of the members of the Committee decided to adopt a text on part-time work, this should take the form of a Recommendation containing only general guidelines and taking into account the needs, circumstances and priorities of member States. It would therefore need to be much less restrictive than the present proposed text. Finally, the Government members of Indonesia and Mexico supported the adoption of a Recommendation, but not a Convention. The Government member of Mexico expressed support for a Recommendation, but not a Convention, on the grounds that the adoption of a Recommendation by the International Labour Conference would give member States the possibility of adopting a Convention at a later date.

Consideration of the proposed texts contained in Report IV(2B)

A. Proposed Convention concerning part-time work

Title

19. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to the title to replace the word "Convention" by the word "Recommendation". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson restated the position of the Employers' members that the Committee should not adopt a Convention on part-time work. Any Convention, no matter how flexible or basic its provisions, necessarily involved a degree of rigidity which would not be conducive to the creation of employment. Part-time work was a central element of employment policy and its flexibility was its greatest advantage. He quoted from a recent study published by the OECD[2] which maintained that "Increasing short-term and lifetime flexibility of working time in contracts voluntarily entered into by employers and workers would lead to higher employment. An important element in this process would be to foster the growth of voluntary part-time work. Governments have a role to play in this process by removing obstacles to, and facilitating, reductions in working-time and by reviewing existing taxation and social security provisions which discriminate against part-time work". The OECD report continued that: "More flexible working-time arrangements could result from measures that: remove obstacles in labour legislation which impede the emergence of flexible working-time arrangements, and encourage employer-employee negotiations on flexible working hours and part-time work; and extend part-time working in the public sector." The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also referred to recommendations and efforts by governments and various groups including trade unions toward the removal of barriers to employment creation and the creation of more employment opportunities through greater labour market flexibility. For example, he stated that the Finance Ministers of the European Union had formed an expert panel to consider removal of barriers to job creation. In addition, the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation had a campaign on the advantages of part-time work. He made further references to efforts by the Government of the United Kingdom to promote part-time work, to a plan of the Government of Belgium to promote flexible and reduced hours through part-time work and to a statement on the view of employee representatives on part-time work contained in a report by the European Foundation for the Improvement of Living and Working Conditions.[3] He suggested to the Government members representing developing countries that if a Convention were adopted by the Committee, they would find that it would act as a constraint on their employment creation efforts. He therefore appealed to the Government members of such countries to take an active part in the debate and to support the proposed amendment.

20. Opposing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson reaffirmed the firm belief of the Workers' members in the standard-setting role of the ILO. The aims of the Workers' members were to increase employment and improve its quality. There was no sense in returning to the free labour market of the nineteenth century. Employment was a means to better living conditions and improved welfare. She referred to the Director-General's Report to the 1994 International Labour Conference Defending values, promoting change,[4] in which great emphasis had been placed on the fundamental objective of social justice. The Declaration of Philadelphia stated that it was the responsibility of the ILO to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of this fundamental objective. Part-time work standards could provide better employment and social justice, thus meeting both goals. Further, ILO standards should not provide a lowest common denominator, but should go beyond and take account of changing trends and priorities in member States. This did not mean that the Convention and Recommendation on part-time work had to address every detail. The texts adopted by the Committee following its discussion the previous year were very flexible, while keeping the two important principles that part-time work should be freely chosen and part-time workers should enjoy equal protection with full-time workers. Indeed, protection was the best means of promoting freely chosen part-time work.

21. In response to the comments of the Employers' Vice-Chairperson on the OECD report, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the OECD had spoken of freely chosen part-time work. Only with freely chosen part-time work could the advantages for employers and workers be realized. With reference to the Employers' Vice-Chairperson's remarks on the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation, she emphasized that the Union's approach was not just to promote freely chosen part-time work, but also to seek protection and equality for part-time workers. Concerning the remarks about the actions of the Finance Ministers of the European Union, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the initiative of the Finance Ministers was controversial.

22. The Government members of Gabon, India, Kenya, Lesotho, Mexico, Swaziland, Ukraine and the United Kingdom supported the amendment. The Government member of India said that the rates of unemployment and underemployment were high in the developing countries. The level of protection provided in the proposed Convention would hinder measures to improve this situation. There was therefore a need to balance the level of protection for part-time workers with the economic needs of employers. The instrument should be designed to promote the creation of employment and should take the form of a Recommendation. The Government member of the United Kingdom argued that part-time work and other flexible working patterns should be promoted and that this objective would not be achieved through the adoption of a Convention.

23. The Government members of Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Chile, Cyprus, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, the Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey, the United States and Venezuela all opposed the amendment. They emphasized the need to adopt a flexible Convention, confined to basic principles, which could be widely ratified. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic added that part-time workers should enjoy the same legal protection as full-time workers.

24. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the Employers' members were not arguing for deregulation, but against further regulation. He also maintained that there was an inconsistency between the positions taken by Government members within the OECD and the European Union, and their support for the adoption of the Convention. In the OECD report referred to previously, they had called for less rigid arrangements for daily, weekly, annual and lifetime working hours and for the negotiation of greater flexibility at decentralized levels. While they sought less regulation through the OECD, they were condoning higher levels of regulation by supporting the adoption of a Convention on part-time work. Further, the Member States of the European Union had been endeavouring to adopt legislation on part-time work that was less restrictive than the proposed Convention for a number of years without success. It would therefore be logical for them to oppose the adoption of a Convention on part-time work.

25. In reply to the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of Germany stated that there was no contradiction between the positions adopted by Germany in relation to the proposed Convention and the above OECD report. Calling for less rigid working time arrangements did not mean abandoning the basic-principle that part-time workers should receive adequate protection. In Germany, legislation setting out minimum standards for part-time workers had been adopted in 1985. The objective of this legislation, and of the proposed Convention, was to achieve equal treatment for part-time and comparable full-time workers. Part-time work played an essential role in combating unemployment. Between 4.5 and 5 million workers were engaged in part-time employment in Germany. Without this legislative framework it would not have been possible to gain the acceptance of part-time work by employers and workers and Germany's unemployment figures would have been higher. He noted that for countries undergoing the transition to a market economy, as had been the case in the Eastern part of Germany, part-time work played a particularly important role in keeping unemployment within certain limits. The Government member of the Netherlands added that, although the OECD report had suggested that obstacles in labour legislation should be removed and that negotiation on flexible working hours and part-time work should be encouraged, it did not say that unequal treatment of comparable workers was necessary for the promotion of part-time work. Referring to the situation in the Netherlands, he stated that inequality of treatment could be counterproductive. In a situation in which there was a shortage of employment, there could be grounds for reviewing employment protection and wages. However, any such changes should be applicable to all workers, whether they were part-time or full-time employees. The Government member of Canada stated, in reference to the seeming contradiction between the position of the OECD countries represented on this Committee and the ministerial meeting of the OECD, that it was necessary to distinguish between a movement to review possible excessive bureaucracy and regulation and a total lack of protection. The proposed Convention was designed to provide basic protection for part-time workers and remove unjustifiable inequalities between part-time and full-time workers. This did not constitute a contradiction in the Government's position.

26. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson agreed with the previous speakers who opposed the amendment and emphasized that the emergence of the new phenomenon of part-time work had given rise to a need to fill a legislative void by regulating such work. The purpose of the proposed instruments was therefore to standardize the general rules applicable to part-time workers and provide guidance to governments. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 38,885 in favour and 47,740 against, with 1,540 abstentions.

Preamble

27. The Government members of Australia, Canada, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United States submitted an amendment which sought to add, after the words "Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention", in the third paragraph of the Preamble, the words "and Recommendation". The Government member of Sweden noted that the Workers with Family Responsibilities Recommendation, 1981 (No. 165), contained explicit reference to part-time workers and completed the references to relevant ILO instruments. The amendment, which was also supported by the Employers' and Workers' members, was adopted.

28. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert, after the fifth paragraph of the Preamble, the following text:

> Stressing the need for employment policies to emphasize the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities and

It was meant to draw attention to the important role played by part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities. All governments around the world were endeavouring to create employment and, without seeking to give the impression that greater importance should be attached to part-time than to other forms of employment, it was important to emphasize the role of part-time work in creating additional employment.

29. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the Preamble to the proposed Convention, and particularly the fifth paragraph, already provided a balanced view of the important elements covered by the instrument. The amendment was therefore unnecessary. If such a reference were to be included in the text, it should be made clear that part-time work had to be freely chosen and adequately protected. The reference might be included in paragraph 5 of the Preamble.

30. The Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment to replace the word "stressing" by the word "recognizing", and the word "emphasize" by the words "take into account". The Employers' member accepted the subamendment. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, who had supported the original version of the amendment, agreed to the subamendment.

31. The Government member of Cyprus, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Australia, Austria, Cyprus, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, opposed the original amendment on the grounds that it could be interpreted as calling for the promotion of part-time work. Speaking for the Government of Cyprus, she supported the subamendment. The Government members of India, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, also supported the subamendment.

32. In response to the opposition to the amendment from the Workers' members and their suggestion that the amendment with the subamendment proposed by Canada be further amended by inserting before "part-time work" the words "freely chosen and adequately protected", or that the amendment be made to paragraph 5 instead, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson proposed an alternative subamendment to include, after the words "the economic importance of part-time work" in the fifth paragraph of the Preamble the words, "the need for employment policies to take into account the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities". The fifth paragraph would thus read as follows:

> Recognizing the importance of productive and freely chosen employment for all workers, the economic importance of part-time work, the need for employment policies to take into account the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities and the need to ensure protection for part-time workers in the areas of access to employment, working conditions and social security, and

This subamendment was adopted.

33. The Preamble, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 1

34. The Government member of Lesotho submitted an amendment to replace the words "are less than those of comparable full-time workers" in subparagraph 1(a) by the words "are significantly less than those of comparable full-time workers as established by national laws, regulations or collective agreements". The Government member of Lesotho believed that the proposed wording would ensure that persons working only slightly less time than full-time would continue to be considered as full-time workers.

35. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that although the concern was understandable, great caution should be used in reconsidering the proposed text of the definition of part-time worker. This was a very important Article on which all other provisions of the Convention and Recommendation would depend. Both the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons recalled the lengthy debate during the Committee's first discussion on the definition of part-time worker and agreed that amendments should be avoided unless absolutely necessary. They therefore opposed the amendment. The Government member of Lesotho withdrew the amendment.

36. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph 1(c) to delete the words "as the part-time worker concerned" in clause (i) and to insert the words "as the part-time worker concerned" after clause (iii), on a new line. It was agreed that this amendment should be submitted to the Drafting Committee since it was not a substantive change.

37. In response to a question from the Workers' members on the reasons why the Office had inverted the order of clauses (i) and (iii) of subparagraph (c), the representative of the Secretary-General stated that this change did not in any way alter the substance of the subparagraph. The "type of employment relationship" had been placed first as a criterion of comparability to emphasize the particular importance of comparing, for the purposes of the protection to be afforded, a part-time worker and a full-time worker with the same type of employment relationship.

38. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to Article 1.1(c) to add at the end of clause (i) the words "provided that the same type of employment relationship cannot refer solely to the number of hours worked;". They were concerned that, under the present wording, it would be possible to consider part-time and full-time work as constituting different types of employment relationship. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson requested clarification from the representative of the Secretary-General on whether a difference in hours of work could be invoked to consider the employment relationship of a part-time worker to be different from that of a full-time worker. He replied that this was not the case and recalled that an employment relationship was not determined by the number of hours worked, but by the duration of the period of employment. This period could be without limit of time (a permanent employment relationship) or of fixed duration (a temporary, seasonal or casual employment relationship). Both part-time and full-time workers were to be found within the various types of employment relationship. On the basis of this clarification, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the proposed amendment.

39. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to Article 1.1(c)(ii) to insert the words "a work of equal value or" after the word "with". Some work was performed only on a part-time basis and as such there were no comparable full-time workers. In these cases it was vital to identify comparable work of equal value.

40. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The amendment was meaningless and unnecessary. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that he knew of no job that was performed solely by part-time workers and the problem, in any case, could not be dealt with by the concept of work of equal value.

41. A number of Government members opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada recalled the Committee's discussions on this issue the previous year. She and her Government fully supported the concept of equal value as set out in the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), which had been ratified by Canada. However, the concept had been developed to deal with wage discrimination between individuals, but also between occupations, in view of the persistently lower wages often paid in occupations exercised largely by women. In the case of part-time work, the discrimination arose out of the number of hours worked, not differences in the work performed. The concept of work of equal value was therefore irrelevant in this context. She stated that the Government members of Canada, Japan, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The Government member of Argentina, regretting that the discussion of the previous year had been reopened, considered that the amendment did not provide any clarification. The Government member of Cyprus also opposed the amendment. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, agreed with the previous speakers and considered that the proposed amendment could only create difficulties and confusion and thus opposed the amendment.

42. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that it was discussing the definition of part-time work, and not a possibility to exclude part-time workers from the provisions of the proposed instrument. She understood from the statements of the other speakers that they also viewed the definition as a means of identifying the appropriate full-time worker for purposes of comparison. Considering that it would be possible to find such comparable full-time workers in all cases and thus was unnecessary to add the concept of "work of equal value", she withdrew the amendment. However, she hoped that an amendment which was to be offered to delete the words "or occupation" from subparagraph (c)(ii) would consequently be withdrawn.

43. Two identical amendments submitted respectively by the Employers' members and by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, sought to delete the words "or occupation" from Article 1.1(c)(ii). The Government member of Germany noted that the Article aimed at setting yardsticks of comparison between part-time and full-time workers. The comparison should relate to actual tasks of workers and not to occupational skills. The Employers' members supported the comments made and agreed that the point of comparison between part-time and full-time workers should be the work actually being carried out. A person's occupation did not necessarily indicate the type of work performed. For example, an architect could be working temporarily as a librarian. The clarification offered in the amendment did not diminish the text, but maintained a proper basis of comparison.

44. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and noted that the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), mentioned "occupation", and requested clarification from the Office on the reasons behind the insertion of the words "or occupation" in the compromise text prepared with the assistance of the Office during the first discussion. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled the difference between the concepts of "occupation" and "work". The former referred to the trade exercised by an individual, whereas the latter concerned the specific type of activity performed by the individual within an enterprise. Practically speaking, many situations could arise when attempting to establish a comparison between a full-time and part-time worker. In certain cases, members of an occupation who were exercising their occupation performed work which hardly differed. In other cases, there could be considerable differences in the work performed. By using the words "or occupation" the scope of comparison within the same establishment was broadened.

45. The Employers' members observed that there was a wide degree of support for an amendment to the existing text and suggested that the word "with" in subparagraph (c)(ii) be replaced by the words "carrying out". The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, noted that if there was a general consensus, they could agree to this subamendment. The Workers' members proposed that the words "carrying out" be replaced by the words "engaged in", which was more in line with the terminology used by the ILO. Article 1.1(c)(ii) would thus read "engaged in the same or a similar type of work or occupation; and". The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

46. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to Article 1.1(c)(iii) to insert the words ", when there is no comparable full-time worker in the same establishment, in the same enterprise or in the same" after the words "establishment or". The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the sponsors, explained that they wished to add an intermediate level between the establishment and the branch of activity for the purpose of comparing part-time and full-time workers. When determining where comparable work was being carried out, such work would be sought firstly in the same establishment, then in the enterprise and finally in the branch of activity. The Workers' members supported the amendment.

47. The Employers' members agreed with the intent of the proposed amendment but felt that it did not establish clearly a hierarchical order and therefore left open the possibility of a choice of levels at which the comparison could be made. With a view to establishing such a hierarchy, they proposed a subamendment so that the text of Article 1.1(c)(iii) would read "employed in the same establishment, or when there is no comparable full-time worker in the same establishment, in the same enterprise, or when there is no comparable full-time worker in the same enterprise, in the same branch of activity". The sponsors of the amendment agreed to the subamendment, which corresponded to their objective of setting a hierarchical order. In reply to a request for clarification from the Government member of Cyprus about the meaning of "enterprise" and "establishment", the Government member of Greece stated that in their legal system, an enterprise was a corporate body which could cover several establishments. An establishment was a labour unit, but not a legal entity. The Employers' members wished to make it clear that comparisons within enterprises did not include cross-border comparisons. The context for comparison was therefore within national borders. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

48. The Government member of the Netherlands requested a clarification from the Office on Article 1.1(c)(iii) concerning persons working through employment agencies. Would the comparable full-time worker for the purposes of Article 1 be a worker employed by the same agency or employed by the establishment in which the work was being performed? The representative of the Legal Adviser stated that in the context of the proposed Convention, the phrase "employed in" was intended to mean "working in" and not "employed by". The type of employment relationship was already covered in Article 1.1(c)(i). National legislation and legal criteria differed as to whether such agencies were "employers" of persons whom they sent to others to perform work. The representative of the Legal Adviser noted that another Committee of the Conference was dealing with the complex questions of the relationships between employment agencies, employers and workers. Understanding the phrase "employed in" as "working in" was also consistent with the amendment adopted to Article 1.1(c)(ii), which now read "engaged in".

49. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the Employers' members were not in disagreement with the response of the representative of the Legal Adviser, who had referred to the critical issue of the employment relationship. In many instances, the agency worker remained an employee of the agency and had no relationship with the employer of the establishment in which he or she was temporarily working. It was thus their understanding that in these circumstances the point of comparison had to be with another employee of the same agency.

50. The representative of the Legal Adviser noted that the Office's concern was that the situation differed among countries. For example, in some countries a worker who had a contract of employment with an agency would be subject to the safety and health responsibility of the owner of the premises where the work was being performed. It was impossible to specify the rule that would apply in any particular situation. Further, Article 1.1(c) had three parts which were cumulative because of the use of the word "and", thus all would be taken into account and one was not necessarily more important than another. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that occupational safety and health was of no relevance to the definition. The definition determined who was a part-time worker. The critical issue was the employment relationship. In all those countries in which agency workers retained an employment relationship with the agency, the comparison could only be made with workers of the agency, and not with another worker in the establishment where the work was carried out. The representative of the Legal Adviser noted again that national legislation would determine the nature of the employment relationship.

51. An amendment was submitted by the Employers' members to replace the words "are not" in Article 1.2 by the words "shall not be". While it was agreed to submit this amendment to the Drafting Committee, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the amendment was substantive and not editorial and that the Workers' members did not support it.

52. Article 1, as amended, was adopted.

Article 2

53. Article 2 was adopted without change.

54. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to Article 3.1 to replace the comma after "workers" by a semi-colon and the words "provided that" by "nevertheless". The Committee agreed to refer this amendment to the Drafting Committee. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the Employers' members did not consider this to be an appropriate amendment.

55. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to add after the words "workers concerned", the words "or otherwise in accordance with national law and practice". The purpose of the amendment was to cover situations in which national law and practice envisaged procedures other than consultation between the representative organizations of employers and workers. The Workers' members firmly opposed the amendment and any questioning of the principle of consultation with the social partners. Given the context of Article 3.1, the Employers' members also opposed the amendment. In addition, the Government members of Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment. In the light of this opposition, the amendment was withdrawn.

56. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to restrict which categories of workers or of establishments could be excluded from the scope of the Convention. Thus, they wished to replace the words "particular categories" by the words "limited categories". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that Report IV(2A) showed that this provision had given rise to many comments. The word "limited" had been used in the original text submitted by the Office the previous year and the Workers' members believed it would be better to return to that text.

57. The Employers' members and the Government members of Argentina and the United States opposed the amendment. In addition, the Government member of Germany, expressing the opposition of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, recalled the extensive discussions on the same point the previous year. He argued that the word "particular" referred to the specific features of certain categories of workers or establishments, and was therefore a qualitative term. However, the word "limited" was more a question of quantity. The proposed change was therefore substantive. Speaking only on behalf of Germany, he said that although Germany was generally opposed to using the exclusions set out in Article 3, it would wish to avail itself of that Article for a specific group of employees in the public service. Approximately one-third of public servants in Germany enjoyed a special status which gave them special rights, as well as special duties and obligations. These rights included protection against dismissal, which was of great value during this period of high unemployment. However, this category of public servants was bound under the Constitution to be prepared to work full time for the State, for example, the police. There were a number of exceptions to this principle but nevertheless, because of this principle, the application of this Article and Article 9.2 concerning the review of laws and regulations would not be acceptable for Germany for this particular group of public servants. It was this category of workers who would therefore be excluded from the provisions of the Convention if Germany ratified it.

58. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson understood that the feeling in the Committee was that any exclusions made from the provisions of the Convention under Article 3 should be determined on qualitative, rather than quantitative grounds. She withdrew the amendment in favour of an amendment to be submitted next by the Workers' members on the possible reasons for exclusion.

59. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add at the end of Article 3.1, the words "for which no alternative solutions are possible that meet the provisions of the Convention". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the objective of the amendment was to provide further guidance on how governments should proceed when contemplating exclusions under Article 3.

60. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and considered that it added nothing to the present text and was therefore superfluous. By definition, if solutions could be found to problems under the terms of the Convention, they would not raise particular problems of a substantial nature. The Government members of Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, opposed the amendment. Also opposed to the amendment, the Government member of Cyprus reminded the Committee that the second paragraph of Article 3 required member States to give the reasons for any exclusions which were made under this Article in its reports to the ILO under article 22 of the ILO Constitution. The exclusions decided upon had to concern categories of workers or establishments which gave rise to real problems in the application of the Convention.

61. The Workers' members were prepared to withdraw the amendment with the understanding based on comments from the various speakers that its inclusion was unnecessary because it was already clear from the present wording of the paragraph that exclusions could only be made when particular problems of a substantial nature arose which meant that no alternative solutions could be found to meet the requirements of the Convention. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that he did not want his silence after the remarks of the Workers' Vice-Chairperson to imply agreement with what she had said. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment based on her previous statement.

New paragraph 3

62. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following new paragraph to the end of Article 3:

> A member which avails itself of the possibility provided for in paragraph 1 above shall periodically review the categories of workers or establishments excluded. The most representative organizations of employers and workers shall be consulted on such a review.

The Workers' members opposed any exclusions from the scope of the Convention. They therefore wished to establish another level of consultation and review of the exclusions permitted under Article 3. The present wording of the Article provided for consultation only under the first paragraph concerning the decision to exclude. She also referred to the discussion in the ILO about reducing the frequency of monitoring, which would increase the need for a periodic review of exclusions at the national level.

63. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and pointed out that it sought to impose obligations on member States in addition to the reporting obligations under article 22 of the ILO Constitution referred to in paragraph 2 of Article 3. Sufficient provision was already made in the Convention to review and report on any exclusions made under this Article. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment, which introduced an element of unnecessary bureaucracy. Also speaking in opposition to the amendment, the Government member of Cyprus reminded the Workers' members that governments would have to report regularly to the ILO on any exclusions they made under Article 3. Moreover, she warned that a periodical review could also lead to the adoption of broader exclusions. The Government member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Norway and Sweden, supported the amendment.

64. The Workers' members considered it entirely normal to create procedures for consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers. However, in view of the lack of support, they withdrew the amendment.

65. Article 3 was adopted without change.

Article 4

66. Article 4 was adopted without change.

Article 5

67. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace Article 5 by the following text:

> Measures appropriate to national law and practice shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers do not, because they work part-time, receive a basic wage which, calculated proportionately on an hourly, performance-related, or piece-rate basis, is lower than the basic wage of comparable full-time workers calculated on an hourly, performance-related or piece-rate basis.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the difficulties encountered by the Committee the previous year in finding a clear wording for Article 5. The Office had proposed a slightly revised text, but the Workers' members hoped that the proposed amendment would be even clearer about what was included in the basic wage. One problem with the current text was the use of the term "wage rate".

68. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also referred to the previous discussions in the Committee on this point and commended the Workers' members on their efforts to produce a more easily understandable text. The amendment would be acceptable to the Employers' members if it could be subamended by the inclusion of the word "solely" before the words "because they work" in the second line. This would add certainty to the text and express the possibility that there might be valid reasons for differential treatment. He also noted that it might be possible for the Drafting Committee to simplify the text since there was some repetition. The Government member of Canada could support the text as subamended, provided it was clearly understood that the basic wage did not include seniority bonuses, merit systems or shift premiums. The Workers' members agreed to accept the subamendment offered by the Employers' members to insert the word "solely".

69. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, stated that these members would be able to accept the subamended text if it could be further subamended by adding the following sentence: "The basic wage of a full-time worker can be determined by legislation, collective agreement, individual contract or in any other manner consistent with national practice". The Government member of Germany explained that the purpose of this proposal was to clarify the meaning of the term "basic wage". In some countries, there were no basic wages established by legislative means; they were determined in collective agreements or in individual employment contracts, and there were no obligations to set a minimum wage. The amendment covered all of these possibilities. There was some fear that, without this further qualification, the proposed wording might establish an indirect obligation to set a minimum wage. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that though the Employers' members could agree with the proposed language, it was a statement of the obvious, and unnecessary to add to Article 5.

70. In reply to a request by the Workers' members for a clarification of the concepts of basic wage and minimum wage, the representative of the Secretary-

General emphasized the fundamental difference between the two concepts. A minimum wage was established by legislation or collective agreement and constituted the rate below which no worker legally could be paid. The basic wage applied to a particular activity and referred to a wage scale applicable to the various categories of workers concerned. Basic wage rates were normally established in collective agreements, and occasionally by regulation, and concerned wages actually paid. The Government members of Austria, Argentina, Finland, Norway, Sweden and the United States supported the text as subamended by the Employers' members with the insertion of the word "solely". On the basis of the explanation provided by the Office, this text was also accepted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

Proposed new paragraph

71. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following new paragraph to Article 5:

> Part-time workers should benefit on an equitable basis from financial compensation, additional to basic wages, which is received by comparable full-time workers.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued that the provisions of the Convention should not be confined to the basic wage, but that they should also cover other financial compensation. She noted that, by using the expression "on an equitable basis", the proposed text envisaged greater flexibility in relation to financial compensation than the text adopted by the Committee on the basic wage. The text of the proposed amendment was already included as Paragraph 9 of the proposed Recommendation. The Workers' members considered that it was important that it be included in the Convention.

72. The Employers' members strongly opposed the amendment and emphasized that there was a great difference between the basic wage and financial compensation. After considerable discussion in the previous year the provision had been placed in the Recommendation. It was totally inappropriate in the Convention. The Government members of India, Nigeria and the United States also opposed the amendment and considered that the text should remain in the Recommendation. The Government member of India noted that the inclusion of this text in the Convention would have an adverse effect on the cost of production. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands and Portugal, said that, although they recognized the merits of the principle underlying the proposed amendment, they believed that in the interests of maintaining the flexible nature of the Convention with a view to its wide ratification, the text should remain in the Recommendation. The Government members of Greece and Spain supported the amendment.

73. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson regretted that the Committee had not wished to include in the Convention the broad concept of remuneration as set out in the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and that it had preferred to confine the provisions of the Convention to the narrower concept of the basic wage. However, recognizing that the language of the amendment would be maintained in the text of the Recommendation, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

74. Article 5, as amended, was adopted.

Article 6

75. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "equivalent conditions" by the words "conditions determined proportionally". It was aimed at strengthening the text concerning the principle of proportionality. This was particularly important in relation to social security, for which equivalent conditions were not appropriate and protection should be based on proportionality.

76. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued that the amendment made the text of Article 6 less flexible. The term "equivalent" was broader: while it covered proportionality it did not exclude the possibility of granting part-time workers full rights in certain cases, or of calculating the extent of their rights in other ways that at least guaranteed proportionality. Clarification on the exact meaning of "equivalent" was required.

77. The amendment submitted by the Employers' members was withdrawn in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom. This amendment sought to clarify how equivalent conditions would be determined and proposed the replacement of the second phrase of the Article by the words "where appropriate, this protection may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions, previous earnings or by any other method consistent with national law and practice". The Government member of Germany, speaking on behalf of the sponsors of the amendment, proposed a subamendment to replace the words "this protection" by the words "these conditions" to refer to the equivalent conditions in the first part of the Article. The text of the amendment as subamended provided more flexibility in the determination of equivalent conditions, which would be calculated on the basis of hours of work, previous earnings, contributions or other criteria. There were fields, such as medical care, where the same level of protection had to be provided to both part-time and full-time workers. However, in other cases, such as paid leave, the principle of proportionality would be applied.

78. The Workers' members could agree to the amendment as subamended provided that the words "or by any other method" were replaced by "through methods". Without such a change, it could be interpreted that any other method could be adequate, even when it was not at least proportional.

79. The Employers' members could support the subamendment only if the word "or" were retained. If the word "or" were to be deleted, the scope of the text would be considerably restricted. Conditions would only be able to be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions and previous earnings through methods consistent with national law and practice. This would exclude such considerations as length of service which might be an appropriate method of determination. The Government member of the United Kingdom also could support the subamendment if the word "or" were retained. The Government members of Canada and the United States agreed. The formulation "or through methods" would give the flexibility to governments to provide equivalent conditions which could be better than proportionality. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the second phrase of Article 6 used the words "may be determined" and therefore served for illustrative purposes. It did not therefore exclude other ways of determining equivalent conditions applicable to part-time workers under social security schemes.

80. The Government member of Switzerland noted that the reference to "previous" earnings in the amendment created difficulties for Switzerland. Although she did not question the principle contained in Article 6, a law in the Swiss social insurance system (the federal occupational old-age, survivors' and invalidity insurance Act), in its present form, was incompatible with the spirit of the Article, since it established an income threshold for access to the scheme. This threshold was based on the earnings of a full-time worker and ignored the question of part-time workers. It was envisaged that the problem would be taken into account during the next revision of the law. However, even if the law were modified in this sense, the word "previous" would cause a problem. Previous earnings were used for the calculation of some types of benefits, while current earnings were the basis for coverage under the scheme. She also corrected the comment on the situation in Switzerland contained in Report IV(2A) in this connection. It was not the social security legislation as a whole, but one law which contradicted the equivalency provision, the nature of which could prevent Switzerland from ratifying the Convention.

81. The representative of the Secretary-General, in answer to a request for clarification on the meaning of the term "equivalent conditions", explained that in Article 6 this term was intended to provide flexibility. It went further than proportionality because it could include more than proportional treatment and could provide equal treatment. There were cases where the principle of proportionality in determining the treatment of part-time workers would make no sense or would be inadequate, for example, in providing medical care, or in the case of minimum benefits which were usually the same for both full- and part-time workers, or where there was a ceiling on earnings to be taken into account. In the latter case, the salary of a full-time worker could exceed the upper earnings limit whereas the salary of a part-time worker would not.

82. The Government member of Cyprus suggested that the addition of the words "or by any other method consistent with national law and practice" weakened the protection provided by the present text of the Article. It might be preferable to end the amendment after the word "earnings" and delete the word "previous" to meet the concern of the Government member of Switzerland. The Government member of Switzerland supported this suggestion as the term "earnings" was sufficiently broad to cover both previous and current earnings. The Government member of Germany noted that previous earnings formed the basis for benefits which were provided for many contingencies, including old age. However, the situation differed greatly from country to country. The Workers'

Vice-Chairperson stated that the Workers' members could support the subamendment suggested by the Government member of Cyprus. Considerable discussion ensued about which subamendments were acceptable to the sponsors of the amendment.

83. In an attempt to reach consensus on the common concerns being expressed, the Employers' members proposed an alternative subamendment which replaced the amendment with the following: "These equivalent conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions, earnings or through methods consistent with national law and practice." The Workers' members proposed to insert the word "other" before the word "methods". This subamendment was supported by the sponsors of the amendment and the Employers' members.

84. The Workers' members asked for a final clarification from the Office on whether the amendment as just subamended would harm the provision on equivalent conditions in Article 6. The representative of the Secretary-General answered that the intent of requiring "equivalent conditions" was to align the conditions of part-time workers with those of comparable full-time workers. Part-time workers could enjoy, in certain cases (such as health care), the same protection accorded to comparable full-time workers. In other cases (such as cash benefits), the protection could be proportional to the hours of work, contributions or earnings of part-time workers. The protection could also be more than proportional. However, the amendment could not lead to an interpretation authorizing protection at a level which was less than proportional to the hours of work, contributions or earnings of part-time workers.

85. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the explanation given by the representative of the Secretary-General reflected the position as it was understood by the Employers' members. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the amendment as subamended was acceptable to the Workers' members on the basis of the explanations given by the representative of the Secretary-General and the Employers' Vice-Chairperson. The amendment as subamended was adopted. Thus the second phrase of Article 6 was deleted and a second sentence added which read as follows: "These equivalent conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions, earnings or through other methods consistent with national law and practice."

86. The Government member of Australia reported that Australia's social security system was not based on occupational activity as stated in Article 6 and referred to in Article 8, she thus wanted the record to confirm that a differently based social security system would not constitute an obstacle to ratification of this Convention.

87. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

Article 7

88. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to specify that the measures taken in Article 7 to ensure that part-time workers received equivalent conditions in the fields listed would be taken "in accordance with national law and practice". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the purpose of the amendment was not to restrict the protection provided by the Convention, but to reinforce the message that any measures taken in order to implement the Convention would be in accordance with national law and practice. The way in which protection under this Article would be ensured varied according to national law and practice. The proposed wording covered these variations. The same wording had already been used elsewhere in the proposed Convention.

89. In opposing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Article 11 of the proposed Convention already established that the provisions of the Convention were to be implemented by laws or regulations or any other manner consistent with national practice. The amendment was therefore superfluous.

90. In answer to a request for clarification from the Workers' members on the implications of using the expression "in accordance with national law and practice" in this and other provisions in the proposed Convention, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that at each session of the Conference members submitted this type of amendment with the idea that the text of the Convention would be rendered more flexible. In practice, they were mistaken in their belief that such an amendment, if adopted, would have this effect. Member States which ratified a Convention had to apply it strictly and rigorously. Member States could not use this wording as an argument to avoid the strict application of the provisions of the Convention on the basis of the state of their national law and practice. If law and practice were not in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, they would have to be changed so that the Convention could be applied rigorously.

91. Agreeing that the proposed amendment was superfluous, the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

92. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to replace the words "equivalent conditions to" by the words "appropriate conditions compared with". Its purpose was to introduce more flexibility to facilitate the application of the Convention under the conditions in different countries. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. It had already been explained that the term "equivalent conditions" permitted a good deal of flexibility. The amendment would only serve to increase the latitude for not treating part-time workers in an equivalent manner. The Employers' members could not support the amendment either. On the understanding that the term "equivalent conditions" included an element of flexibility, the Government member of Japan withdrew the amendment.

93. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that measures to be taken in Article 7 would be taken "in particular" in the fields listed and not just "in the fields listed". The Workers' members wanted to avoid the impression that subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) were limitative. The fields enumerated in Article 7 were universally applicable and had to be mentioned specifically. This did not mean that other fields of protection would not be covered in the context of this Article.

94. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the present wording of Article 7 did not impose any limitation on the granting of protection in fields other than those which were specifically mentioned. Nor did it establish any obligation to establish equivalent conditions for part-time workers in respect of all types of protection. However, the proposed amendment had the effect of extending the required protection to every field, however minor. Article 7 should retain its flexibility. The Committee had agreed in principle that the Convention should confine itself to basic protection and basic conditions. The amendment was therefore totally unacceptable to the Employers' members.

95. The Government members of Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States, opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson observed that a number of members had indicated that Article 7 would not have to be limited to the fields specified. This Article would therefore not prevent a ratifying country from extending equivalent conditions for part-time workers in fields other than the three enumerated in the current text. On this basis, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

96. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Finland, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Turkey and the United States submitted an amendment to add in a new subparagraph (d): "sick leave," to the fields with respect to which measures would have to be taken to ensure part-time workers equivalent conditions to those of comparable full-time workers. The Government member of Australia, speaking on behalf of the sponsors of the amendment, emphasized that sickness was not voluntary and that, since workers did not choose to fall sick, sick leave was a fundamental employment condition. The sponsors of the amendment acknowledged that in many countries sick leave had not been formalized. In those countries, there would be no need to provide sick leave for part-time workers where none was provided for full-time workers. In many countries, categories such as casual workers were not covered by sick leave. Once again, the amendment would not have the effect of requiring the provision of sick leave for part-time casual workers in those countries, any more than for full-time casual workers. However, where sick leave benefits were provided to comparable full-time workers by the employer, it would be necessary to ensure that they were also provided to part-time workers in proportion to their hours of work. The sponsors of the amendment considered that, in the light of the minimum thresholds set out in Article 8, the proposed wording was sufficiently flexible to be incorporated in the Convention. The Government member of Australia added that "sick leave" included both paid sick leave, that is benefits paid to workers while they were sick, and unpaid sick leave where there was entitlement to be absent from work due to illness for a fixed period of time. The Government member of the United States maintained that in many ways sick leave was comparable with paid annual leave and paid public holidays, as set out in subparagraph (c). Sick leave was a very basic employment condition and deserved to be included in Article 7.

97. The Workers' members supported the amendment and expressed agreement with the comments of the Government member of Australia. The Employers' members strongly opposed the amendment. Although the three fields of protection enumerated in Article 7 were of fundamental importance, the same could not be said for sick leave. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson again stressed the fact that the provisions of the Convention should be confined to basic protection.

98. The Government member of Greece raised the question as to whether the benefits provided in the case of sick leave would be the responsibility of employers, as in the case of the other benefits covered by Article 7. He considered that, in many instances, these benefits would be supplied through insurance schemes. In reply, the representative of the Secretary-General said that the regulations regarding the payment of benefits during sick leave varied in the different countries. In a number of countries, employers were obliged to continue to pay wages or to provide sick pay, at least for an initial period of sick leave, in which case social security benefits would only be paid for subsequent periods. In other countries, sickness benefit could be exclusively paid through a social security scheme, or directly by the State. The term "sick leave" covered both the period during which the employer provided sick pay and the period during which sickness benefits were paid through social security.

99. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed consternation at the attempt to pass on to employers the responsibility for providing protection in the cases covered by Article 7. It was unacceptable to imply that employers had the total obligation for maternity protection. He pointed out that the Government member of Australia had conceded that sick leave was not available on a universal basis. Since it was the aim of the Committee to adopt a Convention which would be as nearly universally applicable as possible, the amendment should be rejected.

100. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the rights in question were fundamental and should be provided on an equivalent basis to part-time and full-time workers. She was shocked that the members of the Committee were spending so much time wondering whether governments or employers were responsible for paying the benefits concerned, and consequently supporting or opposing it according to their own particular interests to save costs. It was not the purpose of this Convention to determine the source of such benefits, which would be provided under the system established in each country. The Convention confined itself to providing equivalent rights to part-time workers, without specifying the origin of the benefits provided.

101. In supporting the amendment, the Government members of Argentina, Chile, Gabon and the Syrian Arab Republic emphasized the importance of sick leave. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic believed that sick leave was a fundamental right and should be provided under the same conditions for part-time and full-time workers. The Government member of Argentina reinforced the point that there was no question of establishing the source of the benefits in the Convention. If full-time workers enjoyed rights to sick leave that were not granted to part-time workers, this would constitute discriminat[illegible]. The Government member of Gabon added that the amendment would be in accordance with Gabon's legislation. The Government member of the Republic of Korea agreed that sick leave was a fundamental right. However, he asserted that technical difficulties linked to the definition of sickness and to the differences in the national systems covering sickness could jeopardize wide ratification of the Convention. Since a number of countries, and especially developing countries, might encounter difficulties in implementing the proposed requirements concerning sick leave, he opposed the amendment.

102. The Government member of Germany said that it was important to know whether the amendment referred to rights under labour law or under the social security system. The issue concerned equivalent treatment under existing systems, rather than the creation of new systems. In Germany, legislation had been adopted very recently to extend the right to sick leave to all part-time workers. Sickness was now dealt with more favourably in this respect in Germany than in many other countries. If the proposed amendment affected the social security system, he would not be able to support it. However, if it only concerned benefits provided by the employer in the event of sick leave, he could agree to it.

103. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that maternity protection was proposed in the text of the proposed Convention. On that subject also, both labour law and social security were at stake. She referred to the provision in the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), which stated that employers should not be individually liable for the cost of the maternity benefits due to the women employed by them. Benefits provided during the period of maternity leave should not be financed by employers, but should be covered by the social security system. There were many different systems for the provision of these benefits, even within the Member States of the European Union. It was for individual countries to decide which system they would adopt. Since there were mixed systems for maternity leave, which was already included in Article 7, and for sick leave, there should be no particular problems concerning sick leave. The aim of the amendment was to provide comparable protection for part-time and full-time workers.

104. The Government member of Australia, speaking on behalf of the sponsors of the amendment, reiterated that the principle of sick leave was so fundamental and important that it should be included in a Convention on part-time work. This was particularly true in view of the flexibility already incorporated in the Convention. The entitlement would only apply to part-time workers where it already applied to comparable full-time workers. The equivalence provided in Article 7 and the thresholds set out in Article 8 would also apply. However, she sought confirmation from the Office that her understanding was correct that if sick leave were included in Article 7, it would still be open to those countries which provided sick leave through the social security systems referred to in Article 6 to continue to provide sick leave through those social security systems and in a manner compatible with Article 6. In other words, the inclusion of sick leave in Article 7 would provide no impediment to continuing to deliver sick leave benefits under existing social security arrangements, so long as those arrangements complied with Article 6, and Article 8 as it applied to Article 6.

105. In reply, the representative of the Secretary-General said that "sick leave" comprised both the leave taken by sick persons and the benefits paid during sick leave, either by the employer or the social security system, or both. The inclusion of a reference to sick leave in Article 7 would mean that the benefits could continue to be provided by social security, but both Articles 6 and 7 would apply. With regard to maternity protection mentioned in subparagraph (a) of Article 7 and the proposed insertion in this Article of sick leave, the representative of the Secretary-General noted that in many countries, protection in these two areas was provided under both the legislation governing social security schemes related to an occupational activity, which were referred to in Article 6, and the legislation which governed employment conditions, as supplemented by collective agreements, which were referred to in Article 7. Taking the example of sick leave, he noted that certain aspects of the matter were covered by Article 7, such as considering the time of absence from work as a period of work for the purposes of seniority and the attendant entitlements and the prohibition against dismissal during sick leave. On the other hand, other aspects such as the reimbursement of medical costs or the guarantee of an income during sick leave could be covered under Article 6.

106. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson believed that it was necessary to understand the history of the development of the text. The inclusion of sick leave as a specific provision had never before been proposed throughout the whole process of formulating the proposed Convention. The replies to the original questionnaire sent out by the Office had referred in some cases to the question of paid annual leave and paid public holidays. The Office had noted that a number of replies had suggested that the protection provided under this Article should be extended, but none of them had called for specific coverage of sick leave. The Office had also commented that there had been a number of reasons why it had not been able to take up these suggestions in the Conclusions proposed the previous year, particularly that such an extension of the protection provided under Article 7 might impede ratification on the grounds that, unlike paid annual leave, other forms of leave were not yet recognized in all countries. The Committee had discussed this provision in detail during its first discussion of the proposed instruments. The Committee had rejected an amendment by the Workers' members designed to extend the protection provided by this provision to all working conditions, as well as an amendment to include parental leave and leave for family reasons. At that time the Employers' Vice-Chairperson had stated that this latter amendment constituted an extension of the text proposed by the Office and went beyond the matters raised in the questionnaire. He had emphasized that the rights enumerated in this Article were of a universal nature, which was not the case of parental leave and leave for family reasons. He had noted that parental leave was not universally recognized, even for full-time workers. He now said that the same was true for sick leave. The Employers' members had also pointed out in the first discussion that other conditions were covered in the proposed Recommendation. When the text of the proposed Convention had been circulated by the Office, following the previous year's discussion, one government and a number of workers' organizations had suggested the extension of the protection enumerated in Article 7 to conditions of employment in general. However, no one had suggested the inclusion of sick leave specifically. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson added that, on the question of the extension of the protection provided by this Article, the Office had stated in Report IV (2A) that, on the assumption that it had been the intention of the majority of Members at the first discussion to restrict the scope of the Article to certain crucial areas of conditions of employment in order to allow the widest possible ratification of the Convention, the Office felt unable to retain the proposed additions. The rights established under Article 7 were universal in character unlike, for example, the forms of leave covered by Paragraph 12 of the proposed Recommendation. He added that the absence of any other international labour standards on sick leave was further proof that such leave had not gained sufficient international recognition to be included in the present Convention. Although the inclusion of sick leave in this Article of the Convention might not create problems for some industrialized countries, it would severely affect the Convention's prospects of ratification among developing countries. He therefore called for the amendment to be withdrawn.

107. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson welcomed the amendment, despite the fact that the subject of sick leave had been raised at a rather late stage in the discussions of the Committee. Sick leave was a universal right and was as crucial and important as annual leave and paid public holidays. Article 7 only called for treatment equivalent to that of full-time workers. If, in a particular country, sick leave was not recognized for full-time workers, there would be no requirement to provide it for part-time workers. This allowed plenty of flexibility to countries when they were considering ratifying the Convention. The possibilities for exclusions and thresholds set out in Article 8 would apply just as much to sick leave as the other matters referred to in Articles 6 and 7. Where sick leave benefits were provided by social security schemes, they would be covered by the flexibility established in Article 8, as it related to Article 6. In so far as these benefits were provided by employers, they would be covered by the flexibility contained in Article 8 as it related to Article 7. She therefore called upon the members of the Committee to support this important amendment.

108. The Government member of Germany requested clarification from the Office on three points. First, was it correct that Article 6 involved a comprehensive obligation for equal treatment under statutory social security schemes? Secondly, did Article 6 already cover sick leave in those countries in which sick leave was covered by social security schemes? Thirdly, was it correct that sick leave was not covered by Article 6 in those countries in which it was not a social security benefit, but a legal claim against employers? The representative of the Secretary-General noted that Article 6 dealt only with social security schemes based on occupational activity. This meant that schemes based on residence were not covered by this Article. The notion of sick leave comprised three elements. First, the concept that the employment relationship was maintained during the period of absence from work due to sickness. Second, sick leave could contain an obligation of the employer to pay benefits during an initial period. Both aspects were dealt with in Article 7, not in Article 6. Third, in certain countries, a cash sickness benefit was provided by the social security schemes and only this aspect was covered by Article 6, provided the benefit was based on occupational activity.

109. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, supported the amendment. The Government members of France, Ireland and the United Kingdom did not support the amendment.

110. Put to the vote, the amendment was adopted by 449,820 votes in favour and 326,536 votes against.

111. Article 7, as amended, was adopted.

112. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add, after the words "employment injury", the words "and occupational disease", and sought clarification from the Office on whether these words needed to be added to the English text. They were in the French and Spanish texts. The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the English term "employment injury" covered both industrial accidents and occupational diseases. He cited the title of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), to illustrate the fact that the French and Spanish titles of the Convention referred specifically to both industrial accidents and occupational diseases but, in ILO usage, both were covered by the term "employment injury" in English. The amendment was withdrawn on this understanding.

113. The Government members of Germany, Greece, Luxembourg and Portugal submitted an amendment to delete the words "and of any of the measures taken in the fields covered by Article 7". The Government member of Italy supported the amendment. The Government member of Greece stated that the amendment was withdrawn as a consequence of the adoption of the amendment to include sick leave in Article 7.

114. The Workers' members and the Government member of India submitted amendments to prevent the possibility of excluding part-time workers from the measures to be taken under Article 7 to ensure equivalent conditions in the field of maternity protection. Thus the amendment would insert the words "except maternity protection" after the words "and of any of the measures taken in the fields covered by Article 7". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the concept of maternity protection was not confined to maternity leave and cash benefits, where they existed. It also included health and safety provisions designed to protect pregnant and nursing mothers and their children. She noted that the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), included provisions providing protection against dismissal and allowing nursing mothers to take nursing breaks in the period after confinement. These were crucial and universal aspects of maternity protection to which no exceptions should be made. In Report IV(2A), the Office itself had wondered whether, in allowing the exclusion of maternity protection, paragraph 1 of Article 8 went too far, for example with regard to the protection of pregnant women from work likely to be detrimental to their health and that of their unborn child and had concluded that it should not be possible to apply thresholds in respect of maternity protection, particularly since the vast majority of part-time workers were women. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that, if the amendment were adopted, the resulting obligations would only be to provide equivalent protection to that provided to comparable full-time workers. She also noted that the pecuniary entitlements resulting from the provisions of Article 6 would still be covered by the possible exclusion set out in the first line of Article 8. As in the case of sick leave, where payments in respect of maternity leave were provided by social security schemes, thresholds could still be set in accordance with Article 8. She emphasized that, although the Workers' members clearly wished the Convention to be ratified as widely as possible, some subjects were so crucial and universal that guidelines needed to be set. Referring to the Report of the Director-General to the Conference, she said that ILO Conventions should not merely aim to reflect the lowest common denominator; they should promote higher levels of protection. On such important issues, it was vital that part-time workers should enjoy equivalent protection to full-time workers. It was necessary to take a risk that some countries would not initially be able to ratify the Convention but the Convention could provide them with the stimulus to improve the protection to be established at the national level. Although the Workers' members had accepted considerable flexibility on other points, it would not be fitting for the ILO to adopt provisions on such a crucial issue for women which would discriminate against part-time women workers.

115. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Greece, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain, said that maternity protection was an important field which should not be subject to exclusions. They therefore supported the amendment. The Government members of Austria, the Czech Republic, Norway, Slovakia and Sweden also supported the amendment.

116. The Government members of Argentina, Canada, Cyprus, Ireland, the Republic of Korea, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus said that, if the amendment were adopted, the Convention would be less flexible and some countries in which earnings thresholds, for example, had been established would not be able to ratify it. The Government member of Canada thought that, although the idea contained in the amendment was attractive and seemingly compatible with the system in Canada, it might constitute an obstacle to the wide ratification of the instrument. The Government member of Ireland agreed that the amendment would be an obstacle to ratification. The Government member of the Republic of Korea did not deny that maternity protection was crucial. However, a number of factors in countries such as the Republic of Korea, which were somewhere between the developing countries and the industrialized world, would make it difficult to apply this provision. In a situation of structural adjustment, where there was an exodus from the rural sector and with the growth of the service sector, many employers of part-time workers would not be able to afford the level of protection required. The Government member of the United Kingdom expressed much sympathy with the spirit of the amendment. If it were possible to formulate the amendment so that the prohibition of exclusions in relation to maternity protection were restricted only in respect of health and safety risks for pregnant and nursing mothers, she would be able to support it. The Government member of Cyprus supported that suggestion.

117. Although the Employers' members believed that maternity protection was of great importance, they were unable to support the amendment as drafted. Article 8 of the proposed Convention merely gave governments discretion to exclude part-time workers from maternity protection when their earnings or hours of work were below a specific threshold. This enabled them to deal with a wide variety of situations, such as workers who worked for only one hour a week. However, the change sought to be introduced by the amendment would require that, for all aspects of maternity protection, the conditions of part-time workers should be equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers. The areas of protection would therefore be wider than those set out in the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103). This provision would be particularly onerous on small businesses, which might be forced to guarantee the right of pregnant women to return to their jobs after confinement, even if they only worked one hour a week.

118. The Chairperson proposed a subamendment to make the amendment read as follows: "except measures of maternity protection which are intended to protect the health of the mother and/or her child".

119. This subamendment was supported by the Workers' members and the Government member of Canada. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that it was necessary to protect pregnant women and young mothers against both general health risks, such as the hours they worked and jobs involving standing or lifting weights, and occupational hazards, such as exposure to chemical substances, which were particularly hazardous for pregnant women. The Government member of Canada believed that the Chairperson's suggestion focused on the essential element of health and safety, while removing an impediment to the ratification of the Convention by allowing exclusions to be determined from the financial benefits related to maternity.

120. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the above subamendment was too broad and might include concepts such as extended maternity leave. The Employers' members were looking for a qualification that dealt specifically with occupational safety and health risks. A working group met to try to find a consensus text. Following its consultations, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson reported the group's proposal for a subamendment as follows: "except measures of maternity protection necessary to protect the health of a pregnant woman and her unborn child".

121. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson regretted that the above wording did not offer an appropriate solution to such a vital and essential issue. The text needed to address broader protection, including for the period after confinement. Moreover, the reference to the health of a pregnant woman might not be sufficiently broad to cover the necessary employment security and protection against dismissal during the period leading up to and following confinement. She therefore preferred the original amendment.

122. The Government member of Ireland proposed a substitute subamendment as follows: "except measures of maternity protection other than statutory social security measures". He explained that the purpose of the subamendment was to ensure that the thresholds permitted under Article 8 as applied to Article 6, could still be established in respect of maternity benefits provided by statutory social security schemes.

123. In answer to a request from the Workers' members for clarification from the Office, the representative of the Secretary-General said that the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Ireland made it clear that the social security schemes in Article 6 were not covered by the subamendment, that is, they were still subject to the possibility of the exclusion under Article 8. The Workers' members accepted the subamendment. The view of the Employers' Vice-Chairperson that the subamendment meant that exclusions could still be made to maternity protection provided to part-time workers under social security schemes was confirmed by the Chairperson. Although the Employers' members were not opposed to maternity protection for part-time workers, they remained concerned by the extent to which equivalent conditions in respect of maternity protection would be required for part-time and full-time workers. By way of illustration, the text as subamended by the Government member of Ireland would mean that, if a comparable full-time worker enjoyed a guaranteed period of leave, for example 12 months, and a guaranteed return to employment in relation to pregnancy and confinement, the same condition would have to be provided to part-time women workers whose hours of work were very low. Although the proposed wording did not address these concerns, and although it made the text of Article 8, paragraph 1, very confusing with exclusions and exceptions from exclusions, the Employers' members supported the subamendment.

124. The Government members of Austria, Finland, Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway and Sweden supported the subamendment. Although the Government member of Cyprus would have preferred the exception to the exclusions permitted under Article 7 to relate only to the health of the mother, she did not wish to oppose the amendment. She suggested that the drafting of Article 8, paragraph 1, could be improved by the Drafting Committee. The amendment as subamended was adopted. As a result, paragraph 1 of Article 8 read as follows:

> A Member may exclude from the scope of any of the schemes referred to in Article 6, except those providing employment injury benefits, and of any of the measures taken in the fields covered by Article 7 except measures of maternity protection other than statutory social security measures, part-time workers whose earnings or hours of work are below specified thresholds, which shall be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers.

125. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the phrase "which shall be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the amendment was designed to give the text greater clarity and to simplify a complicated provision. It would also have the effect of expanding the discretion available to governments to decide upon any exclusions which were necessary under Articles

6 and 7. It was clear that such exclusions should be determined in a reasonable manner.

126. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the Committee's broad discussion on this point the previous year. The current text had been arrived at after much argument and, although the Workers' members did not support any exclusions from the provisions of the Convention, they had finally agreed to the text of this Article in order to provide the flexibility needed by some governments. She reminded the Committee that an important provision in the Recommendation called for the progressive reduction of any thresholds set in this connection.

127. At the request of the Workers' members, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the supervisory machinery for the application of ratified Conventions expected that a country which had ratified a Convention would avail itself of the possibilities of exclusion established in the Convention in good faith and would not therefore use them in practice to exclude the majority of workers concerned. In the case of the proposed Convention on part-time work, these possibilities of exclusion were provided for in Article 3 (exclusion of certain categories of part-time workers or establishments where the implementation of the Convention raised particular problems of a significant nature in their regard) and in Article 8 (exclusion of part-time workers whose earnings or hours of work were below thresholds determined with reference to the scope of social security schemes or the protection foreseen under Articles 6 and 7). As the possible exclusions were very broad, the supervisory machinery would undoubtedly examine with great care whether the Members which had ratified the Convention had used them in good faith.

128. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

129. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the words "which shall be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers", by the following text:

> With respect to Article 6, thresholds shall be sufficiently low not to exclude without reasonable grounds a significant percentage of part-time workers. With respect to Article 7, thresholds shall be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers.

The Government member of Germany, referring to the situation in Germany and explaining that the situation in several other countries of the European Union was similar, said that the exclusions covered by this paragraph were of crucial importance for the possible ratification of the Convention. The Government of Germany had no problems with regard to the text as currently worded as it affected Article 7. The problems concerned the exclusions relating to Article 6. Under the current wording, the problem arose as to how many workers could be covered by the exclusions allowed in relation to Article 6. In the proposed amendment, the term "unduly large" would be replaced by the term "a significant percentage" of part-time workers, who could only be excluded on "reasonable grounds". In explanation, the Government member of Germany referred to the German situation as regards health insurance. A great number of workers were excluded from such insurance. However, those part-time workers who were not covered by health insurance through their part-time employment were, for example, insured through their spouses, their status as retirees or through another employment relationship. Moreover, recent surveys had shown that most part-time workers were reluctant to contribute to retirement schemes which would provide only a very low level of benefits. There was therefore little reason to provide coverage for many of these workers, even though their numbers were high and could be as many as 2 or 3 million who were not covered by social insurance. It was therefore important that the grounds for exclusions should be qualitative rather than quantitative. Finally, he noted that the "reasonable grounds" upon which exclusions were based would have to be justified by member States which ratified the Convention.

130. The Employers' members supported the amendment based on the explanation given by the Government member of Germany. The Workers' members opposed the amendment and believed that thresholds referred to in Article 8 were not necessary at all. The amendment introduced a new criterion for exclusion on qualitative grounds to which the Workers' members were firmly opposed. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that the current wording of the proposed Convention had been suggested by a number of Member States of the European Union during the Committee's first discussion. They should therefore show consistency in retaining the current wording. Moreover, the amendment would require a whole discussion of the interpretation of the phrase "reasonable grounds". Although the present text provided for the possibility of thresholds, it needed to be borne in mind that an important component of the proposed instruments was that these should be reduced and that part-time workers should be treated in an equivalent manner to full-time workers.

131. The Government member of Cyprus, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, India, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, expressed firm opposition to the amendment, which could open the possibility of broad exclusions from the provisions of Article 6. The Government member of Canada added that the wording in the current text "an unduly large percentage of part-time workers", although open to interpretation, clearly meant that the majority of part-time workers could not be excluded. The proposed amendment introduced additional concepts which would need further interpretation. The Government member of Argentina agreed that it would be very difficult to implement the wording set out in the amendment.

132. The representative of the Secretary-General commented that the current wording of Article 8, paragraph 1, did not prevent the percentage of workers who were excluded through the application of thresholds from being large, but it did prevent this percentage from being "unduly large", that is from being large without serious cause. He believed that it could therefore be considered that the concern of the sponsors of the proposed amendment had already been taken into account in the existing text.

133. The Government member of Germany asked for the opinion of the Legal Adviser on whether under Article 8 a high percentage of part-time workers could be excluded from the social security schemes referred to in Article 6 if there were sufficient reasons in national legislation to do so. The Legal Adviser noted that the question concerned the meaning of the word "unduly" in Article 8. The issue was whether the requirement for thresholds specified in reference to Articles 6 and 7 to "be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers", took on a meaning which was not only quantitative, but also qualitative, in the sense that it presupposed serious grounds which would have to be explained by the Member to justify exclusion. This question concerned the interpretation of a term which was destined to be included in a Convention, which was an international treaty. In accordance with article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969), the applicable rule was that the text of a treaty had to be interpreted "in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of its object and purpose". Two additional points should be noted in this respect. In the first place, a term could be understood in a particular sense if it was established that such was the intention of the parties. Secondly, the preparatory work on the treaty played only a subsidiary role in establishing the meaning of the text or the term. In the light of these principles, the first issue was to establish the ordinary meaning of the term "indûment" in French and "unduly" in English. According to the dictionary Le Grand Robert, one of the current meanings of the term "indûment" was "without cause". The abridged edition of the same dictionary went further in the definition "without legal cause". The meaning of the term "unduly" in English, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, fully coincided with that of the French term. The first meaning given was "without due cause or justification". It could therefore be stated that, according to the ordinary meaning, this term signified that the specification of thresholds must not result in the exclusion of a large percentage of part-time workers if there was no justifiable cause. It should also be noted that this literal meaning was strengthened by its context, that is in particular by subparagraph 2(b) of Article 8 of the proposed Convention, which provided that, in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO, a Member had to indicate the reasons for the thresholds in force. Thus the text was clear. If any doubt were still to persist with respect to this term, as noted above, the preparatory work could play a subsidiary role in determining the issue. Although the word "unduly" had been introduced by amendment during the first discussion, it did not appear at that time to have been the subject of detailed explanations. However, the discussions of the Committee at this session, and this legal opinion, would clearly confirm that the intention was to give the word "unduly" one of its ordinary meanings, which included the sense of justifiable cause. From this point of view, the matter could be settled without ambiguity.

134. On behalf of the sponsors of the amendment, the Government member of Greece said that, in the light of the above clarification, it was understood that the wording "unduly large percentage" included both qualitative and quantitative elements. The percentage of part-time workers excluded could be large if there were reasonable grounds for doing so. The amendment was withdrawn.

135. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment which would have the effect of replacing the words "which shall be sufficiently low not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers" by the words "determined in accordance with national law and practice, which shall not exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers". The Government member of Japan referred to the differences in the treatment of part-time and full-time workers under social security schemes. Thus the Convention should leave it to the parties in accordance with national law and practice. The provisions of the Convention should not have the effect of hampering part-time work. The amendment had therefore been submitted to provide greater flexibility. However, due to the lack of broad support, he withdrew the amendment.

136. In relation to Article 8.1, the Government member of Switzerland referred to a specific feature of accident insurance in Switzerland. The accident insurance scheme covered both occupational and non-occupational accidents, although under slightly different conditions. Workers were covered in respect of occupational accidents irrespective of their hours of work. However, in order to obtain coverage under this scheme in respect of non-occupational accidents, they had to be employed for a minimum of 12 hours a week. The spirit of the Swiss legislation therefore appeared to be in accordance with Article 8 of the proposed Convention, since it did not apply thresholds in the case of occupational accidents. However, she wished to obtain confirmation of the interpretation which would be subsequently made by the supervisory machinery of the following words in Article 8: "the scope of any of the schemes referred to in Article 6, except those providing employment injury benefits". She requested clarification from the Office as to whether this would constitute an impediment to the ratification of the Convention, as it was currently worded, by Switzerland. She added that those workers who were not covered under the accident insurance scheme in respect of non-occupational accidents nevertheless benefited from coverage under the Swiss health insurance scheme.

137. In his reply, the representative of the Secretary-General considered that the supervisory machinery for the application of ratified Conventions would not make a distinction between, on the one hand, countries in which occupational and non-occupational accidents were covered by one and the same scheme and, on the other, countries in which the two types of accidents were covered by different schemes. The Swiss scheme conformed to Article 8 of the proposed Convention, which forbade the application of thresholds in relation to occupational accidents. The threshold established under the Swiss scheme in respect of non-occupational accidents would not be in contravention of Article 8, although, in accordance with Article 8, paragraph 2, the Swiss Government would have to provide the supervisory machinery of the ILO with information concerning the reasons for which the threshold of 12 hours per week had been established and the percentage of part-time workers excluded as a result.

138. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to delete the word "review" from the phrase "the establishment, review and revision of the thresholds referred to in paragraph 1 above". The Government member of Greece in explaining the amendment, stated that it was sufficient to provide for consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers in relation to the establishment and revision of thresholds. Consultations in relation to the review of such thresholds would be superfluous. The Government member of Germany added that the term "review" covered a broad range of activities which were difficult to determine. These could include low-level discussions or a major re-examination of the thresholds in question. The present wording would therefore be difficult to apply in practice.

139. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the Committee's discussions the previous year, when the word "review" had been included as a result of an initiative by the Employers' members. The term "revision" implied the necessity of change, whereas the word "review" did not imply any need to modify thresholds which had been established. They believed that it was important for the most representative organizations of employers and workers to be consulted at all stages of the establishment, review and revision of the thresholds in question. The Workers' members agreed with the previous speaker and opposed the amendment. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

140. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed new Article after Article 8

141. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add the following new Article: "Where obligations on employers depend on the number of their employees, part-time workers may be given less weight than full-time workers" and subamended it to add at the end "in proportion to their hours of work". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted that the concept of proportionality had already been included in a number of Articles of the Convention. Certain obligations were placed upon employers which depended on the number of persons whom they employed. For example, works councils might have to be established when enterprises reached a certain number of employees. It was unreasonable to impose such an obligation for the same number of part-time workers who worked very few hours a week. Another example was the obligation to notify the government authorities when a certain number of employees were to be dismissed. It was only reasonable that these obligations should be in proportion to the hours worked by part-time workers. This amendment was clearly of great importance to small businesses.

142. Opposing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that a similar provision was contained in the Recommendation. The provision was opposed by the Workers' members, who considered that it discriminated against part-time workers and was likely to impair equality of treatment and encourage the replacement of full-time workers by part-time workers with a view to avoiding certain obligations. The spirit of both the Convention and the Recommendation was to achieve greater equality of treatment.

143. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Sweden, the Syrian Arab Republic, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. These Government members generally believed that such a provision was not appropriate in the Convention and noted that a similar provision existed in the Recommendation, where it should remain. The Government member of Italy also opposed the amendment.

144. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asked the representative of the Secretary-General whether the explanation which he had given earlier in the Committee's deliberations of the term "equivalent conditions", which was used in various places in the proposed instruments to qualify the situation of part-time workers in relation to comparable full-time workers, also applied to the matter covered by the proposed amendment. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that his explanation concerned provisions relating to the protection of part-time workers, which should be the same in certain cases (such as health care), or which could be calculated in proportion to the working hours, contributions or earnings of part-time workers in other cases (cash benefits). However, this explanation did not relate to other provisions of the proposed new standards, such as the manner in which part-time workers were taken into account in the calculation of the number of employees in an enterprise for the purposes of determining whether that enterprise was subject to a specific legal obligation. The amendment was withdrawn by its sponsors.

145. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to change the requirement that measures be taken to "facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time work" to require measures that would "remove obstacles" to such work. The Government member of Greece said that the present wording could be understood to include the concept of encouraging part-time work. The amendment avoided such interpretation and was more neutral.

146. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson, speaking in opposition to the amendment, noted that during the previous years' discussions, the Committee had debated Article 9 at length and had set up a working group to draft a compromise text. To avoid reopening the debate, the Workers' members had therefore decided not to propose any amendments to the Article. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also preferred to retain the existing text and opposed the amendment. Also opposing the amendment, the Government member of Cyprus favoured retaining the current text, which had been the result of a compromise. She pointed out that the text had been amended during the Committee's first discussion to replace the word "encourage" by the words "facilitate access". The fears expressed by the sponsors of the amendment were therefore unjustified. The amendment was withdrawn.

147. Concerning the measures to be taken under Article 9, the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to say that the measures were to be taken "as appropriate". The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the sponsors, maintained that the addition of the words would give the text more flexibility for countries in varying stages of economic development and with different legal systems. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson firmly opposed the amendment. It would give governments so much flexibility that they would be free to take no measures at all on this important point, which was a matter of great concern to the Employers' members. They wanted access to part-time work to be facilitated by the measures in paragraph 2. The Workers' members believed that the words "as appropriate" could only make sense in subparagraph 2(a) and opposed the amendment. The Government members of Canada and Chile also opposed the amendment. While the Government of Canada noted that these words did add flexibility to the text, she recalled that this Article had been the subject of long discussions during the Committee's first discussion and, although the delicate compromise reached might not satisfy all concerned, it was one that had achieved general acceptance. The Government member of Chile added that, although the amendment provided flexibility, it also made the Article much less clear. The amendment was withdrawn.

148. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the words "employers and workers, notably those of" after the words "preferences of" and subamended it to read "employers and workers, and notably those of" in subparagraph (c). The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the amendment, as subamended, was intended to remedy what appeared to be an oversight. The subparagraph included measures that would give special attention in employment policies to the needs and preferences of specific groups, but did not refer to the needs and preferences of employers and workers as provided under paragraph 1 of the Article. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson preferred the existing text to remain consistent with the decisions taken last year by the Committee and not to reopen the debate.

149. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Government member of Canada emphasized that the subparagraph did not stand in isolation and that the first paragraph of the Article referred to the needs of both employers and workers. It was therefore implicit in the text of the Article as a whole that the special attention called for in subparagraph (c) would take into account the needs and preferences of employers and workers. The amendment was withdrawn.

150. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert the following new subparagraph after subparagraph (c): "consideration of ways in which employment policies can take into account the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the Committee had accepted the inclusion of an amendment to the Preamble containing the same concept. The amendment was therefore a logical extension of the text of the Preamble, as adopted by the Committee. It merely required Governments to give consideration to certain matters. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. This idea was already sufficiently set out in the Preamble, thus it was not necessary to include it in the text of Article 9. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

151. Article 9 was adopted without change.

Article 10

152. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "where appropriate" at the beginning of the Article. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reassured the Committee that the Workers' members did not wish to remove all the flexibility from the Convention. They did want two issues to be covered by the Article: that the transfer from full-time work to part-time work was freely chosen and that a refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work would not constitute valid grounds for dismissal. There was no room for flexibility on these points.

153. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the long debate during the Committee's first discussion of this issue. The text finally agreed upon was still confusing. However, the expression "where appropriate" was essential to the text. Although the Employers' members were not able to support the amendment in its present form, they recognized that it might be possible to reformulate the text so that the words "where appropriate" were no longer necessary. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment. She also recalled the Committee's first discussion of this provision, which would not be easy to implement by governments. In fact, their actions might be seen as undue government interference. She noted that in many economic circumstances the choice might well be between part-time work and redundancy. In this respect, part-time work was not always freely chosen. However, Canada had submitted no amendment to the text of Article 10 because, although not perfectly formulated, it provided for flexibility by the term "where appropriate". The Government member of Cyprus, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, India, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, opposed the amendment. She stated that the current text of Article 10 was well balanced and the result of a compromise.

154. Following consultation between the Employers' and Workers' members, the following replacement text was proposed for Article 10:

> 1. Transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa is a matter to be determined by agreement.
> 2. A worker's refusal to transfer shall not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment, without prejudice to the possibility of termination for a valid reason based on the operational requirements of the establishment concerned or the worker's terms of employment.

Explaining the above text, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed to the two principal concepts which it contained. In the first paragraph, the transfer from full-time to part-time work had to be by agreement. This agreement could take the form of a collective agreement, which might stipulate the conditions under which such a transfer would be required, and under which the worker would be expected to accept the transfer. The agreement could also take the form of an agreement reached between the worker and the employer at the time of engagement, which might stipulate conditions under which such a transfer would take place. Finally, the agreement could be made between the two parties at the time of transfer. Therefore, in the absence of a collective agreement, the employment contract would establish the conditions of the transfer. If there were no prior agreement on this matter, it would be governed by an agreement reached at the time of the transfer. The second paragraph of the proposal established that the refusal of a full-time worker to transfer to part-time work would not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment. There were, however, two exceptions to this provision. The phrase "without prejudice to the possibility of termination for a valid reason based on the operational requirements of the establishment concerned" covered situations in which a request for a transfer to part-time work was made by the employer but refused by the worker when it was clearly the only option available to the employer because of operational requirements. However, for this clause to come into effect, there would need to be a valid reason based on those operational requirements. The second exception referred to the terms of employment of the worker and referred back to the first part of the text. Where there were prior existing arrangements between the employer and worker for the transfer to part-time work under certain conditions and if a worker refused such a transfer, provided the transfer was supported by a valid reason, employment could be terminated. The two types of circumstances set in the latter part of the sentence were therefore vital to the understanding of the situation of a full-time worker who refused a transfer to part-time work.

155. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson agreed that the first paragraph of the proposed replacement text provided that transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa needed to be determined by agreement between both parties. This agreement could take the form of a collective or individual agreement. The effect of the text was to provide that such a transfer could not be imposed unilaterally by either the worker or the employer. Concerning the second paragraph, she particularly emphasized that the two types of circumstances referred to at the end of the text did not constitute an exception to the main rule. The main rule was that a refusal to transfer to part-time work did not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment. In the present instrument it was not necessary to go into the details of other reasons for termination and into their validity. The proposed text only referred to the fact that such other possibilities for termination might exist. She reminded governments that the proposed new text for Article 10 did not require them to take any measures, but merely to monitor the agreements freely concluded between the parties. The text therefore was within the context of the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that there should be no misunderstanding about the meaning of the second paragraph, which was to be read as a single sentence. If the worker refused to transfer, the employer could terminate the worker's employment if a valid reason based on operational requirements were established or the refusal violated the terms of a collective or individual agreement.

156. The Government member of Canada argued that the proposed text was not about the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining. It was about unjust dismissal. The particular problem which faced Canada was that labour legislation relating to unjust dismissal existed only for the federal workforce. None of the ten Provinces or the two Territories had adopted legislation on unjust dismissal. Moreover, she disagreed that the proposed text would not require action from governments. Governments were always under an obligation when they ratified Conventions, whether this consisted of setting out a provision in the law, or providing legal guidance as to the subjects to be covered in collective bargaining. If this text were to be adopted, Canada would have great difficulty in ratifying the Convention. The Government member of Cyprus considered that the proposed replacement text for Article 10 raised a number of problems, particularly as regards the termination of the employment relationship. A Convention on part-time work was not the place to cover this issue, which was already dealt with in other international labour standards, particularly the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158). The Government members of Argentina, Finland, Germany, Greece, Ireland and the United Kingdom mentioned various difficulties raised by the text. The Government member of Ireland did not believe that this was an appropriate instrument to deal in such a fundamental way with the question of dismissal. The Government member of the United Kingdom wondered if it might be easier to achieve a consensus on the basis of the current text of the proposed Convention.

157. In view of the opposition expressed by the above speakers, and following consultations, the Employers' and Workers' members proposed to subamend the text of Article 10 by replacing the words "freely chosen" by the word "voluntary", and by deleting the words "and taking into account the operational requirements of the establishment concerned." The text of Article 10 would therefore read as follows:

> Where appropriate, measures shall be taken to ensure that transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa is voluntary, in accordance with national law and practice.

Explaining the above subamendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that it was his understanding that the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice" covered situations where either collective agreements or individual agreements established the conditions governing the transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa. The decisive factor would be whether the collective or individual agreement stipulated circumstances under which such a transfer should take place. In some cases, these circumstances might also be established by national legislation. In support of the new text, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that it provided an opportunity for legislation and agreements to further define the principle that transfers from full-time to part-time work or vice versa had to be voluntary. Although the Workers' members preferred not to have the words "where appropriate" in the text, they were prepared to agree to their inclusion in order to provide the necessary flexibility to enable governments to ratify the Convention.

158. The subamendment was supported by the Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Lebanon, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United Kingdom. The subamendment constituting a new text of Article 10 was adopted.

159. Article 10, as amended, was adopted.

Article 11

160. Article 11 was adopted without change.

B. Proposed Recommendation concerning part-time work

Preamble

161. The Preamble was adopted without change

Paragraph 1

162. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "considered" by the word "applied". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the term "applied" was traditional ILO language in Recommendations and the Workers' members opposed any unnecessary modernization of this usage. The matter had been raised in the Committee's first discussion, when the Legal Adviser had said that the substitution of the terms "applied" and "considered" would not have any legal implications. However, the Workers' members considered that the term "applied" was more appropriate to a Recommendation which supplemented a Convention.

163. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the lengthy debate on this issue during the first discussion of the proposed instruments. The Employers' members considered that it was not accurate to say that a Recommendation should be "applied" in conjunction with the related Convention. The term "considered" was much more suitable to cover a situation in which governments might or might not have ratified the accompanying Convention. The Employers' members therefore opposed the amendment.

164. The Government member of the United States speaking on behalf of the Government members of Canada, Cyprus, Finland, India, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, opposed the amendment. The term "applied" was ambiguous as to the obligations of member States which had not ratified the Convention. He also noted that the term "applied" had not been in standard usage in referring to the relationship between Recommendations and Conventions before 1990; the normal term of reference had been "supplement". The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Luxembourg, Portugal and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Government member of Argentina also opposed the amendment. The Government members of Greece, Italy, the Netherlands and Spain abstained. The amendment was withdrawn by its sponsors.

165. Paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 2

166. The Committee decided to use in the proposed Recommendation the definition of the term "part-time worker" which it had adopted in Article 1 of the proposed Convention.

167. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 3

168. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add the following text at the end of Paragraph 3:

> provided that, to the extent that a Member has availed itself of the possibilities of exclusion set out in Article 3 of the Convention, the Recommendation shall not apply to the categories of workers or establishments so excluded.

The Employers' Vice-Chairperson indicated that its purpose was to ensure that the provision relating to the scope of the Recommendation was aligned with the provision relating to the scope of the Convention. He argued that it was only sensible to establish that the same possibilities should be available under the Recommendation as under the Convention to governments to exclude certain categories of workers or establishments from its provisions. Referring to the Committee's first discussion, he noted that the representative of the Secretary-General had stated that ILO practice in this respect was not uniform. In certain cases the scope of Conventions and their corresponding Recommendations was exactly the same, and in others it differed. The Employers' members believed that governments should have the same opportunities for exclusions under both of the proposed instruments.

169. Opposing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the Recommendation was not an instrument which imposed binding obligations upon governments. It was an important provision of the Recommendation that any thresholds established, for example in relation to social security schemes, should be progressively reduced or revised. It was therefore illogical to make the same exclusions under both instruments. Indeed, the normal tradition in the ILO was for Recommendations to be broader in scope than the Conventions which they accompanied. The purpose of a Recommendation was to set out guiding principles. Furthermore, the Committee had expressed its opposition to a similar amendment the previous year.

170. The Government member of Canada speaking on behalf of the Government members of Australia, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, opposed the amendment. She stated on behalf of Canada that although Canada had supported an amendment on this point during the first discussion, that particular amendment had proposed identical wording to the Convention. It was often the case that certain provisions, such as definitions, were identical in Conventions and their accompanying Recommendations. However, in this case, the amendment introduced a new element. She agreed with the Workers' members that it was traditional for Recommendations to go further than Conventions. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

171. Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.

172. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "on a broad scale" from the phrase "employers should consult the representatives of the workers concerned on the introduction or extension of part-time work on a broad scale". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that the term "on a broad scale" had been introduced by the Office following last year's discussion to replace a similar expression that had been adopted by the Committee. It was of great importance that workers' representatives were consulted on the introduction or extension of part-time work. The current wording permitted broad exceptions from such consultation. She emphasized that part-time work often was introduced at first for only a small number of workers, but that it could expand over time. It was therefore important to hold consultations even when only a small number of workers were concerned by part-time work in the first instance. Thus, consultations should be held on the qualitative issue of the introduction of part-time work itself and not just the quantitative issue of how many part-time workers there were. The amendment made it easier to leave the issue of consultation to the parties involved, without restricting negotiating possibilities.

173. Opposing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the Committee's first discussion on this point. The present wording had received broad support during the consultation process since the Committee's first discussions. The term "on a broad scale" was appropriate in this context, since it would be unrealistic if employers had to consult workers' representatives on each occasion that they wanted to employ a single part-time worker or one more. Such decisions often had to be taken rapidly, and could be delayed by too much consultation. The Government members of Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

174. Paragraph 4 was adopted without change.

175. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the word "specific" which qualified the conditions of employment on which part-time workers were to be informed. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the purpose of this amendment was to remove the ambiguity caused by the word "specific" which the Office had drawn attention to in Report IV (2A), as well as to lay a foundation for a following amendment to be submitted by the Employers' members to replace "in writing or by any other means" by another formulation. It was not clear whether "specific" referred to all the conditions of employment of part-time workers or only those which were related to their part-time status. There were a great many conditions of employment and it would be impractical to set a requirement that part-time workers should be informed of all of them.

176. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The word "specific" referred to those conditions especially related to part-time workers. Any ambiguity would be removed by a subsequent amendment that they were going to submit which would enumerate some examples of the conditions of employment about which part-time workers should be informed. In the case of some conditions of employment, such as normal hours of work, it was much more important to inform part-time workers, whose hours of work would tend to vary from case to case, than full-time workers, whose hours of work were usually uniform. It was important for part-time workers to receive information on their employment conditions in writing, or by other means consistent with national law and practice.

177. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, opposed the amendment. They considered that the term "specific" was necessary to denote those working conditions which were particularly related to part-time work on which information should be provided to the workers concerned. The Government members of Argentina, Austria, Cyprus, Finland, the Republic of Korea, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and Turkey also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

178. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "in writing or by any other means" by the words "to the extent, and by means". The objective of the amendment was to emphasize that the manner and extent to which part-time workers would be informed on certain matters whether in writing or by other means, would be determined by national law and practice. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the consensus which had been reached on the present text during the Committee's first discussion. She said that it was essential for the information to be provided in writing; removing such reference would seriously weaken the text. However, to cover countries where there was no tradition of a written contract, the text covered other means of communication consistent with national law and practice. The Government member of Argentina opposed the amendment. The notion of written conditions needed to be retained as it was important to ensure good faith in the employment relationship and legal stability. The Government members of Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Greece, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

179. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following text to the end of Paragraph 5:

with regard to at least:

(a) their normal hours of work on a daily or weekly basis,

(b) their basic wage,

(c) their type of contract and type of work;

(d) their entitlement to holidays, annual leave and other types of leave; and

(e) the collective agreements and regulations applicable to them.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that this illustrative list of crucial employment conditions which should be covered as a minimum by the provision on giving information to part-time workers, would remove any ambiguity from the text. She emphasized that the Recommendation was not a binding instrument, but so amended would provide useful guidelines on the type of information which should be provided to part-time workers. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the grounds that it was too specific and unnecessary. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the listing of conditions in the proposed amendment was inconsistent with the use of "specific conditions" in the current text.

180. The Government members of Algeria, Austria, Canada, Chile, the Czech Republic, Finland, Nigeria, Norway, Sweden, Slovakia, Switzerland and the United States supported the amendment, which provided useful guidance as to the essential employment conditions about which part-time workers should be informed. The Government member of Algeria said that initial codification of labour law was being undertaken in Algeria and this list would be of indicative value. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. The Government member of Germany considered that the list contained items which were not specific to part-time workers, but which also applied to full-time workers. Although he was not opposed to the principle that part-time workers should be informed of their contractual conditions and the provisions of applicable collective agreements, this principle was already sufficiently covered by "specific conditions" in the original text. The Government member of Cyprus observed that implementation of clause (e) of the amendment would be difficult in practice. Moreover, unlike clauses (a)-(d), clause (e) did not refer to a specific condition of employment. The Government members of Argentina, Egypt, Gabon, India, Indonesia, Japan, Lebanon and Swaziland also opposed the amendment.

181. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stressed that the amended text would retain a reference to national law and practice and that there was no inconsistency between the word "specific" and the enumeration of some of the essential elements on which information should be supplied to part-time workers. It was essential to provide part-time workers with information on the significant points referred to in the amendment which were usually included in employment contracts of full-time workers. In some cases, part-time workers needed more specific information on their employment conditions than full-time workers, because the conditions of full-time workers, such as their hours of work, might be more immediately evident than those of part-time workers. She reiterated that this text would form part of a Recommendation only and should not pose problems to the Member States of the European Union, where Directives containing provisions on workers' information already existed. In countries where requirements on providing workers with information on these matters were not yet so well developed, the Recommendation would stimulate such a practice.

182. In reply, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated the opposition of the Employers' members to the amendment. Under certain circumstances, by drawing attention to specific issues, the proposed text might even have the effect of limiting the information required to be given to part-time workers. He also expressed reservations about the reference to "regulations" in clause (e), as there were many hundreds of regulations applicable to part-time workers, for example in the field of occupational safety and health, and it would be impossible to provide workers with information on all of them.

183. The Government member of Australia stated that although she was also concerned about the large number of regulations which applied to workers at the workplace, perhaps there were overscrupulous interpretations of the amendment. The Government member of Ireland considered that the basis specified for determining hours of work in clause (a) of the amendment was not consistent with the definition contained in Paragraph 2(1)(b) of the Recommendation. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 96,492 votes in favour and 112,574 votes against.

184. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to add, at the end of the paragraph, the words "within a time-limit to be determined by Members". The Government member of Greece speaking on behalf of the sponsors, believed that specifying a time-limit for providing information would be a useful clarification to the text. The Government member of the United Kingdom explained that the information in question needed to be provided at a time when it was of use to the workers concerned. This might be at the time of engagement, or within two or three months. If there were no time-limit, the information might be provided too late to be of value. The amendment met these concerns and provided flexibility. The amendment was supported by the Government member of Cyprus on the understanding that it meant that the information should be provided fairly quickly.

185. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the proposed amendment was ambiguous. Was the intention to ensure that the information was provided to the worker at the time of engagement, or was the amendment actually intended to provide latitude for delaying the provision of this information? She proposed to subamend the text to read: "at the time of engagement". If the Government members intended this to be the purpose of the amendment, that formulation was suitable for a Recommendation. The Government member of Greece proposed instead a different subamendment to say "at the time of the contractual agreement or within a reasonable time-limit to be determined by Members". This proposed subamendment was opposed by the Workers' members since they saw no point in the provisions of a Recommendation encouraging governments to set broader time-limits for providing information. The Employers' members and the Government member of Canada also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

186. Paragraph 5 was adopted without change.

187. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "if appropriate" in clause (a). The Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued that the type of flexibility provided by this wording was completely misplaced in a Recommendation, particularly as regards the essential objective of the provision, the progressive reduction of threshold requirements for access to statutory social security schemes. In opposing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the words "if appropriate" were essential to subparagraph (a). There were many situations in which it might not be appropriate to reduce threshold requirements. The Government member of Canada, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, India, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, stated their opposition to the amendment. It would imply that there would be no thresholds in any case even though there were valid reasons for some which could also be advantageous for workers. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom also opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

188. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to clause (b) to include sickness benefits in the list of social security benefits contained in subparagraph (b) with respect to which minimum or flat-rate benefits would be granted, as appropriate, to part-time workers. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson indicated that the amendment reflected the inclusion of sick leave in the provisions enumerated in Article 7 of the Convention. It was therefore logical to include the same reference in the Recommendation. The amendment referred to the benefits during sick leave provided by statutory social security schemes. She reaffirmed that sick leave was an important and universal right. The Employers' members opposed the amendment taking the view that sickness benefits were qualitatively different from the other minimum flat-rate benefits enumerated in subparagraph (b). They should not therefore be covered by this text. The Government member of Cyprus had the same reservation about the different nature of sickness benefits and wondered whether minimum sickness benefits existed.

189. The representative of the Secretary-General commented that the subparagraph referred to all kinds of minimum or flat-rate benefits, of which a number of examples were enumerated. Where flat-rate sickness benefits existed, they would already be covered even if they were not specifically enumerated. In answer to the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, who also pursued the question of whether minimum or flat-rate sickness benefits existed, he stated that to his knowledge, flat-rate sickness benefits existed in Ireland and the United Kingdom.

The Government member of Swaziland opposed the amendment in view of the explanation that sickness benefits would be covered by the current text.

190. The Government members of Australia, Austria, Finland, Norway and Sweden supported the amendment, as did the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom. The Government member of Greece, on behalf of the latter countries, stated that the amendment brought the text into line with the provisions of Article 7 of the Convention. In view of the level of support, the Employers' members did not oppose the adoption of the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

191. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the words "accepting in principle that", at the beginning of clause (c), by the words "examining whether and how" in relation to allowing unemployed part-time workers to limit their search to part-time work and still meet the conditions of availability for work to receive unemployment benefits. The Government member of Spain, speaking on behalf of the sponsors explained that it gave greater flexibility to the Recommendation. In Spain and in a number of developing countries, many part-time workers undertook part-time work primarily because they could not find full-time employment. The situation was different in many industrialized countries, where a high percentage of part-time workers only sought part-time work. Under Spanish legislation, to be entitled to unemployment benefits, a worker had to be involuntarily unemployed and therefore available for work. If an unemployed part-time worker refused an offer of full-time work, the worker was no longer considered to be available for work and was therefore not entitled to unemployment benefits under the Spanish system. The new formulation would not create a problem for the more industrialized countries in which the entitlement set out in subparagraph (c) already existed. However, the adoption of the amendment would make it easier to apply the Recommendation in most countries. The Employers' members strongly supported the amendment for reasons just stated by the Government member for Spain.

192. Opposing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the very long discussion held by the Committee during its first examination of this point. The Committee had decided not to include a provision stating that full-time workers would not be excluded from the provision of unemployment benefits if they refused to accept part-time work, on the grounds that the instruments should concentrate on the situation of part-time workers only. The Committee had accepted the principle that part-time workers who were unemployed, but only seeking part-time work, should be entitled to receive unemployment benefits. She therefore opposed any attempt to weaken the text.

193. The Government member of Canada noted that the situation described by the Government member of Spain also applied in Canada, therefore if there were strong support for the amendment she would not oppose it. On the other hand, she stated that the words "aim at" in the introductory sentence of Paragraph 6 allowed for an evolutionary approach and on this basis she could oppose the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus, elaborating on this latter point, argued that the sense of Paragraph 6 as a whole was that the situation of part-time workers should be progressively improved, whereas, if the amendment were adopted, the text would mean that governments would be free to deny unemployment benefits to part-time workers who became unemployed and sought only part-time work. She therefore opposed the amendment. After a majority of Government members had expressed opposition to the amendment, it was withdrawn.

194. Paragraph 6, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 7

195. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add the words "where appropriate" to the beginning of subparagraph (1). The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the flexibility provided by the amendment was as essential in the case of private occupational schemes as that provided in paragraph 6(a) for statutory social security schemes. The intention of subparagraph (1) was that any threshold requirements established under these schemes should be progressively reduced so that part-time workers could be covered as widely as possible. The logic of the proposal was that such thresholds should eventually be reduced to zero. This was an inappropriate assumption in the case of private occupational schemes, just as it had been in the case of the statutory social security schemes covered by Paragraph 6. Opposing the amendment, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that since the purpose of the Recommendation was merely to give guidance, this type of flexibility was not necessary.

196. The Government members of Austria, Egypt, Finland, Norway, Sweden, Turkey and the United States opposed the amendment. The Government members of Argentina, Belgium, Canada, China, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Gabon, Germany, Greece, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Lebanon, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Swaziland and the United Kingdom supported the amendment. After a majority of Government members had indicated their support for the amendment, it was adopted.

197. Paragraph 7, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 8

198. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "as appropriate" by the word "existing" at the beginning of subparagraph (1). The Workers' Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the subparagraph referred to existing threshold requirements based on earnings or hours of work which should be progressively reduced. There was no need for additional flexibility.

199. Opposing the amendment, the Employers' members said that the Committee had consistently taken the view that these instruments should have maximum flexibility. The words "as appropriate" were necessary in this subparagraph since it would not be appropriate to reduce totally all relevant thresholds. The amendment was also opposed by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Lebanon, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Nigeria, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Sweden, Turkey and the United Kingdom. The amendment was withdrawn.

200. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert in subparagraph (1) the words "as a condition for coverage by the protective laws and regulations", after the words "threshold requirements based on earnings or hours of work as specified under Article 8 of the Convention". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that its objective was to restore the text that had been adopted by the Committee during its first discussion, which had been modified by the Office since then for the reasons stated in Report IV (2A). The Workers' Vice-Chairperson failed to see what difference the addition would make. The amendment was opposed by the Government members of Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States. The amendment was withdrawn.

201. Paragraph 8 was adopted without change.

New paragraph after Paragraph 8

202. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following new paragraph:

> Where part-time workers have more than one job, their total hours of work, contributions or earnings should be taken into account in determining whether they meet threshold requirements as referred to in Paragraphs 6, 7 and 8.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the proposed amendment referred to a problem which had not yet been addressed in the proposed instruments on part-time work. This concerned the application of the threshold requirements referred to in Paragraphs 6, 7 and 8 of the Recommendation and Articles 6, 7 and 8 of the Convention to part-time workers who had more than one part-time job. It was relatively common in certain sectors, such as education, for part-time workers to have two or more part-time jobs. It would therefore be inappropriate for the threshold requirements referred to in these provisions of the proposed instruments to be restricted to a single part-time job and not take account of all jobs, which for some workers could equal full-time employment. In some countries, such as Germany, provisions of this type had already been established. These countries should have no difficulty in accepting the amendment.

203. Opposing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered it strange that this issue should be raised so late in the Committee's deliberations. Although the Employers' members understood the motives behind the proposed amendment, they were strongly opposed to it for practical reasons. It would be almost totally impossible for employers to apply a provision of this type. In the case of private occupational schemes, the provision would need to be applied by adding up the hours of work and earnings of part-time workers who had more than one job. However, in practice, private employers had no means of knowing what other work was being carried out by their part-time employees, and particularly the details of their earnings and hours. Moreover, the question would arise of which of the two or more employers of the part-time workers in question would be responsible for providing benefits, such as annual leave. There was also the question of which of the employers would be responsible for meeting the financial obligations arising out of the accumulation of two or more jobs.

204. The Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and the United Kingdom, stated their opposition to the amendment on the grounds that it would impose impracticable obligations on employers. The Government member of Cyprus, on behalf of the Government member of Australia, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States, also opposed the amendment, and considered that its implementation would give rise to numerous practical problems. The Government member of Spain supported the amendment.

205. Although the Workers' Vice-Chairperson did not believe that the amendment would raise such serious problems in practice, she could accept a reformulation of the text to limit its application to statutory social security schemes. Under such collective schemes, it made little difference whether the hours of work, earnings or contributions relating to part-time workers came from one or more sources of employment, since each worker was covered by a single account. Following a suggestion made by the representative of the Secretary-General that the proposed new paragraph should refer only to Paragraph 6 of the Recommendation, she proposed a subamendment to replace the words "as referred to in paragraphs 6, 7 and 8" by the words "in statutory social security schemes". It was understood that these schemes were those based on occupational activity.

206. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the proposed new paragraph, as subamended, was mainly the concern of governments. However, he warned that the application of the new text might involve significant problems. He cited the example of a part-time worker with two jobs, for which the separate hours of work might be below the threshold for the payment of contributions, but in total above the threshold for the provision of benefits. However, the Employers' members were not in disagreement with the principle behind the subamended text and would not oppose the views of a majority of Government members on this point.

207. The proposed text as subamended was supported by the Government members of Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Finland, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Swaziland, Sweden and the United States. However, it was opposed by the Government members of France, India, Ireland, the Republic of Korea and the United Kingdom. The Government member of Germany abstained. The Government member of the Republic of Korea reminded the members of the Committee that many part-time workers were currently excluded from statutory social security schemes in the developing countries and in the newly industrialized countries. The proposed text would therefore create problems for these countries. He also noted that part-time workers with more than one part-time job gave rise to serious problems in the collection of labour market statistics at the national level. He acknowledged that the Recommendation did not impose any binding obligations on member States, but stated that the provisions of such an instrument still had to be considered. After a majority of the Government members of the Committee had indicated their support for the proposed amendment as subamended, it was adopted by the Committee.

208. A new paragraph was adopted.

Paragraph 9

209. Paragraph 9 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 10

210. An amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to add to the end of the paragraph the following sentence: "As far as possible, these facilities and services should be adapted to the needs of part-time workers". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that it was often difficult for part-time workers to make use of welfare facilities and social services. By way of illustration, part-time workers who worked in the evening often experienced difficulties in gaining access to facilities which were only available during the day. Other services, such as child-care facilities, might only be available on a full-time basis for five days per week, while part-time workers required them over a shorter or different period. It was important to extend such services to part-time workers and to adapt them to their needs.

211. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the amendment was not necessary as its intent was already encompassed in the existing text. However, if the Workers' members felt that it was absolutely vital to have an amendment, it should not form a separate sentence and should be aligned more closely to the existing text. The Government member of Cyprus agreed that there should not be an additional sentence. She proposed a subamendment to replace the full stop at the end of the existing paragraph with a comma and to add the words "which to the extent possible should be adapted to take into account the needs of part-time workers". The subamendment was supported by the Workers' and Employers' members and the Government members of Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Finland, France, Gabon, Germany, Greece, India, Indonesia, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Swaziland, Sweden and the United Kingdom. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

212. Paragraph 10, as amended, was adopted.

213. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (1) to say that "The work schedule" rather than "The number and scheduling of hours of work" of part-time workers should be established. The objective of the amendment was to make the text of the subparagraph more consistent with subparagraphs (2) and (3) which referred to work schedules. The issue to deal with in this Paragraph was the time at which work was to be carried out, not the number of hours to be worked. The number of hours to be worked was established on the basis of the requirements of the enterprise, sometimes by collective agreements, which designated the limits within which work could be carried out. Part-time workers were engaged to work for a specific number of hours. It was therefore more appropriate to confine this clause to the establishment of the work schedule. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that there were many types of part-time workers, and particularly casual or other atypical workers whose hours of work and work schedules changed from week to week. It was therefore important to state that their interests needed to be taken into account in both the establishment of the number of hours of work and in their scheduling.

214. The Government member of Canada supported the amendment. She considered that the number of hours to be worked was established on the basis of the work which was offered. It was more a question of how the hours were to be scheduled. The Government member of Australia opposed the amendment because hours of work could vary from week to week, or even more frequently. It was especially important for part-time workers, many of whom had family responsibilities, to have their interests taken into account in establishing the number of hours to be worked. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn.

215. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert in subparagraph (1), after the words "the interests of the worker", the text "with regard to, for example, continuous and regular working hours". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that the purpose of the amendment was to give an example of the workers' interests to be taken into account. One of the principal interests of part-time workers was to work continuous and regular working hours. Although the number of hours to be worked by some part-time workers was clearly established in their contracts of employment, other part-time workers suffered from major variations in their working hours. They could be nearly full time one week, and only called upon to work a small number of hours the next. This was a particular problem for workers with family or other responsibilities, whose needs and interests needed to be taken into account in accordance with the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention (No. 156) and Recommendation (No. 165), 1981.

216. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that it was unnecessary because the idea expressed by the amendment was already contained in the subparagraph. Furthermore, it was undesirable because it gave an inaccurate view of the main concerns of many part-time workers. It assumed that they adopted the same attitude as full-time workers to continuous and regular working hours, but not all part-time workers wished to work continuous and regular hours. In particular, casual workers by definition did not work regular hours. Moreover, in some service industries, such as hotels, catering and tourism, it was not possible for workers to have continuous working hours.

217. The Government member of Swaziland opposed the amendment because, by introducing an example of the interests of the worker, without giving an example of the interests of the establishment, it would result in an unbalanced text. The Government member of Fiji emphasized the need to adapt the schedules of part-time workers to the operational requirements of the establishment. The Government member for Argentina considered that the amendment omitted other examples of conditions of employment which might be of equal importance for part-time workers. The Government members of Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, the Republic of Korea, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

218. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to replace subparagraph (2) by the following text: "Changes in the agreed work schedule and work beyond scheduled hours should be subject to prior notice as far as possible or to other restrictions in accordance with national law and practice". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson explained that this redrafting preserved the intention of the original text while attempting to take care of difficulties identified during the Committee's first discussion. The meaning of the word "restrictions" was so vague as to be meaningless. The amendment specified these restrictions as prior notice, as far as possible, and other restrictions established in accordance with national law and practice.

219. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that the Employers' members had sought to delete the whole Paragraph during the Committee's first discussion. She also recalled that at the initiative of the Government member of Canada, the original text had been amended to include greater flexibility by including "as far as possible". The Workers' members preferred the current text. The Government members of Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Canada, the Czech Republic, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Gabon, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Slovakia, Spain, Turkey and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment.

220. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed surprise at the opposition expressed by the Government members to the Employers' members' amendment. He added that the present text was not correct, as prior notice was in fact a restriction. He trusted that this would be corrected by the Committee's Drafting Committee. He withdrew the amendment with reservations and great reluctance.

221. Paragraph 11 was adopted without change.

222. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "on an equitable basis" by the words "under equivalent conditions". The Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the comments contained in Report IV(2A) on this point. The Office had suggested that the Conference might wish to consider whether it would be appropriate for part-time workers to have access to the forms of leave in question, not merely on an equitable basis, but under conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers. The idea was to ensure, where it was possible to compare part-time and full-time workers, that part-time workers were treated in the same way or at least under conditions which did not discriminate against them.

223. Opposing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted that this change had not been supported by the responses to the text circulated by the Office. The text of Paragraph 12 referred to a number of types of leave, including paid educational leave. In Report IV(2A), the Office had cited the example of casual part-time workers who would have no entitlement to paid educational leave unless such leave were available to comparable full-time workers. He knew of no circumstances under which a casual worker would want or need access to paid educational leave. He emphasized that many part-time workers were already in the education system, which was why many undertook part-time work. He therefore firmly opposed the amendment.

224. Requested by the Government member of Cyprus to further explain the suggestion made by the Office in Report IV(2A) that the Conference might examine the possibility of replacing the words "on an equitable basis" by the words "under equivalent conditions", the representative of the Secretary-General noted that Paragraph 12 made explicit reference to comparable full-time workers. Under these conditions, the Office did not see why the expression "under equivalent conditions" was not used in this point of the Recommendation when it had been used in other provisions, such as Articles 6 and 7 of the Convention. The expression "under equivalent conditions" had been explained on a number of occasions as meaning either the same protection as that afforded to comparable full-time workers, or protection which was proportional to the hours of work, contributions or earnings of part-time workers.

225. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the term "on an equitable basis" had been employed on three occasions in the Recommendation, in Paragraphs 9, 10 and 12. No amendments had been proposed to its usage in Paragraphs 9 and 10. In Paragraph 9, the phrase referred to financial compensation in addition to basic wages. There was a certain commonality between paid leave and financial compensation, and it would therefore be consistent for Paragraphs 9 and 12 to use the same terminology. In Paragraph 10, it related to access to welfare facilities and social services. The Employers' members understood equity as referring to fairness and justice. There were therefore good reasons for retaining the wording "on an equitable basis", which signified that the relevant circumstances would be taken into account on a fair and just basis.

226. In reply, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson explained that there were specific reasons why the phrase "on an equitable basis" had been retained with reference to financial compensation in Paragraph 9. Although the Workers' members would also have preferred to refer to equivalent treatment in that Paragraph, they recognized that the circumstances relating to financial compensation were fairly complex, particularly as regards issues such as the performance of work at inconvenient hours by part-time workers. However, Paragraph 12 referred to leave, which was an easier matter. It should be provided to part-time workers under equivalent conditions to comparable full-time workers. She emphasized that the term equivalent signified that the treatment of part-time workers could not only be proportional, but also could be equal to that of comparable full-time workers. In no circumstances could it be less than proportional. This coincided with explanations that had been given by the representative of the Secretary-General.

227. The Government member of Germany stated that there was some confusion concerning the difference in meaning between the terms "equitable" and "equivalent". He affirmed that the term "equitable" was not necessarily proportional treatment, but could include more favourable treatment in certain cases. For example, leave to care for a sick member of the family could be more than proportional to the weekly hours of work of a part-time worker.

228. The representative of the Secretary-General was asked to clarify whether keeping the expression "on an equitable basis" would mean that there could be circumstances in which a part-time worker might not benefit from the leave to which a comparable full-time worker was entitled. The representative of the Secretary-General answered yes, provided that the treatment of the part-time worker was not inequitable. The expression "on an equitable basis" referred to equity, while the expression "under equivalent conditions" related to equal treatment in comparable situations. In reply to a question about whether the term "on an equitable basis" implied the proportional treatment of a part-time worker in relation to a comparable full-time worker, the representative of the Secretary-General said that, in its broadest sense, this expression could refer to proportional treatment, but that it did not necessarily imply such treatment. He added that, in the context of Paragraph 12, the concept of proportionality could apply, for example, to the amount of leave or the conditions of entitlement to leave, but not to the right to leave. The expression "under equivalent conditions" was broader than the concept of proportionality. He recalled in this regard his reply to a similar question during discussion of Article 6 of the proposed Convention (paragraph 81).

229. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and the United Kingdom opposed the amendment. However, it was supported by the Government members of Chile, Italy and Spain. On the basis of the explanation provided by the representative of the Secretary-General, the amendment was also supported by the Government members of Australia and Cyprus. The Government member of the Republic of Korea noted that the term "equitable" covered the provision of proportional treatment to comparable part-time and full-time workers. The Government member of Germany reiterated that there were cases in which the term "on an equitable basis" would cover more favourable treatment for part-time workers than treatment calculated on a proportional basis. There were also negative aspects of the term "equivalent". He cited the example of the provision of educational leave. If such leave were provided for a full day course and financial resources were given on a proportional basis, part-time workers might only participate for the number of hours which they normally worked in a day, which would effectively prevent their participation in the course.

230. Following a proposal by the Government member of Cyprus, the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to the effect that the text of "on an equitable basis" would be replaced by the words "on an equitable basis and as far as possible under equivalent conditions". The Employers' members were prepared to accept the subamendment. The subamendment was also supported by the Government members of Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Fiji, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, India, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey and the United Kingdom. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

231. The Government members of Indonesia and Thailand submitted an amendment to replace the words "another member of the worker's immediate family" by the words "spouse of the worker". The Government member of Indonesia referred to the need to specify the family member concerned more precisely to make it clear that the leave in question could not be granted in the case of the illness of a member of the extended family.

232. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson referred to the reference to "family members" in Article 1, Paragraph 2, of the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1981 (No. 156). This specified that the provisions of the above Convention were to apply, in addition to dependent children mentioned in Paragraph 1, to men and women workers with responsibilities in relation to other members of their immediate family who clearly needed their care or support, where such responsibilities restricted their possibilities of preparing for, entering, participating in or advancing in economic activity. It was therefore clear that the wording used in Paragraph 12 was not intended to cover the whole family. The coverage was merely intended for those requiring the greatest care and support, and should not be linked only to the state of financial dependence of the family members on the worker concerned. She also noted that the definition of "immediate family" would be covered by the provisions adopted in the different countries. The Paragraph referred to the forms of leave already available to comparable full-time workers, and would not therefore involve the recognition of new forms of leave.

233. The Employers' members also opposed the amendment. Although they understood the concerns expressed by the sponsors of the amendment, the term "immediate family" was meant to limit the text and did not cover the extended family. The amendment was opposed by the Government members of Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, India, Ireland, Italy, the Republic of Korea, Japan, Luxembourg, Malta, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Government member of Swaziland noted that the concerns of the sponsors of the amendment were already covered by the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice". The Government member of the Republic of Korea understood the concerns of Asian countries concerning the extended family because of their traditions, but foresaw difficulties with the wording of the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn by its sponsors.

234. Paragraph 12, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 13

235. Paragraph 13 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 14

236. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete the words "where practicable" from the beginning of the Paragraph. The Paragraph would then read "Appropriate measures should be taken to overcome specific constraints on the access of part-time workers to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility." The Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued that it was superfluous to state both "where practicable" and "appropriate". It was important to strengthen the provision to ensure that part-time workers were not treated as second class workers.

237. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as drafted. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asserted that there were sound reasons for using both "practicable" and "appropriate". He noted that, because of the special characteristics of certain types of part-time workers, such as casual part-time workers, there were obvious limits to the training, career opportunities and occupational mobility to which they could in practice have access. To try to reach consensus, he proposed a subamendment to delete only the word "practicable". The Paragraph would therefore begin with the words "Where appropriate, measures should be taken ...". The subamendment was accepted by the Workers' members and supported by the Government members of Argentina, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Swaziland and the United Kingdom. The amendment was adopted as subamended.

238. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

239. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to delete clause (a) of Paragraph 15. The Government member of Germany spoke on behalf of the sponsors. He referred to the complex and confused discussion during the Committee's first examination of this point, which had not resulted in a satisfactory wording of the clause. This clause was intended to cover situations which were discriminatory against part-time workers when they were obliged to pay proportionately higher contributions than comparable full-time workers. But he pointed out that there were instances where the effect was not discriminatory. For example, under the German retirement benefits system, where ceilings applied to wages, part-time workers might pay proportionately higher contributions as compared with full-time workers; in such cases, however, they also enjoyed proportionately more favourable benefits.

240. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that there could be reasonable grounds for contributions being proportionately higher for part-time workers because they resulted in proportionately higher benefits. This occurred in some cases where ceilings were applied to contributions and where a corresponding maximum level was placed on the provision of benefits. The Workers' members would not be against a wording of the clause which excluded contributions that resulted in corresponding higher benefits. They proposed that the following words be added at the end of clause (a): "unless these contributions are justified by corresponding proportionately higher benefits". The Government members of Argentina, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain supported the text proposed by the Workers' members. The Government member of the United Kingdom did not agree to it. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed to the difficult balance between avoiding discouragement to part-time work through the imposition of higher contributions and the need to maintain the costs of operating social security schemes within certain limits. Clause (a), although it also affected employers, was mainly of concern to governments. The Employers' members would not therefore stand in the way of consensus reached on this point. The text proposed by the Workers' members was adopted by the Committee.

241. The Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to replace the word "excessively" at the beginning of clause (b) with the words "without reasonable grounds, significantly" in regard to adapting provisions which reduced unemployment benefits of unemployed workers who temporarily accepted part-time work. The Government member of Germany said that the provision of unemployment benefits to unemployed workers who temporarily accepted part-time work depended on the circumstances under which the hours of work were reduced and the number of hours worked. For example, there was little reason to provide unemployment benefits to an unemployed full-time worker who accepted part-time work amounting to 80 per cent of full-time hours, which resulted in little reduction in earnings. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the discussion of the meaning of "unduly large" under Article 8 of the Convention and the rules of interpretation which had been explained by the Legal Adviser. Thus there were rules for interpreting "reasonable grounds" too. As with the words "unduly large", "reasonable grounds" could include both quantitative and qualitative reasons for reducing the benefits in question. The Workers' members could therefore agree. The amendment was supported by the Employers' members and the Government members of Argentina, Cyprus, Finland, Malta, Norway, Sweden, Turkey and the United States. The amendment was adopted.

242. Paragraph 15, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 16

243. Paragraph 16 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 17

244. Paragraph 17 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 18

245. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the existing paragraph by the following text:

> A worker's refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa should not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment, without prejudice to termination, according to national law and practice, for other reasons such as may arise from the operational requirements of the establishment concerned.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson informed the Committee that, after consultations with the Employers' members, they had agreed to the amendment if it were subamended to add the words "in itself" after the words "should not" in the second line. The Workers' members agreed. The current text of Paragraph 18 lacked clarity as to whether "dismissal" meant termination at the initiative of the employer on a unilateral basis. The term "termination of employment" was used in the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), and clearly meant termination at the initiative of the employer. This Recommendation on part-time work was not to deal with termination of employment in general but should state clearly that a worker's refusal to transfer from or to part-time work was not a valid ground for termination. Under Convention No. 158, valid reasons for terminating the employment of a worker also could be connected with operational requirements of the establishment, thus the amendment would be consistent with that Convention.

246. The Employers' members confirmed that they were prepared to accept the amendment as subamended. The term "termination of employment" clearly implied that the employment relationship was ended at the initiative of the employer, in accordance with the definition contained in Convention No. 158. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled his remarks during the discussion of Article 10 of the Convention. The effect of the amendment was to make clear that the refusal to transfer from full-time work, or vice versa, in itself — taken on its own — did not constitute a valid reason for termination of employment. However, it could lead to termination if operational requirements of an establishment necessitated such a transfer. Moreover, if the conditions stipulated in a collective or individual agreement required a transfer in certain circumstances, then the refusal to transfer could constitute a valid reason for termination. Inserting the words "according to national law and practice" provided sufficient flexibility to take into account variations in the conditions in different countries.

247. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the purpose of this Recommendation was not to regulate the whole issue of termination of employment, nor the possible content of agreements in which a change of contractual hours of work was at stake. National law and practice differed from country to country on that subject, as did provisions regarding partial unemployment.

248. Following a request for clarification on the meaning of the amendment as subamended, the representative of the Secretary-General recalled the earlier statement of the Legal Adviser who explained that, in accordance with Article 31(1) of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969), the applicable rule was that the text of a treaty had to be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to the terms of the treaty in their context and in the light of the objective and purpose of the treaty. The objective of the amendment as subamended had been clarified by the sponsors. Two other points should be made. First, a term or phrase could be understood in a particular way if it had been established that this had been the intention of the parties concerned. In this case, both the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons had explicitly referred to the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), and, more specifically, to Articles 3 and 4 of that instrument. Secondly, the preparatory work only played a subsidiary role in establishing the meaning of the text or the term. The Office considered that the amendment as subamended was not ambiguous. After further requests for clarification, the Chairperson emphasized that the subamended text contained two points: firstly, the refusal by a worker to change from part-time to full-time work or vice versa did not in itself constitute a valid reason for termination of employment; and, secondly, this did not mean that termination of employment would not be valid for other reasons according to national law and practice, such as those arising out of the operational requirements of the establishment concerned. After a request for a clarification on the meaning of "dismissal" and "termination of employment", the Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted that, to some persons, the former might imply a punitive act, which was not necessarily the case for the latter. The expression "termination of employment" was consistent with the terminology used in Convention No. 158.

249. The Government member of Ireland suggested that the wording of the proposed amendment as subamended did not necessarily fully reflect the explanations provided by the previous speakers. He suggested that the commas after the words "termination" and "practice" in the third line of the amendment should be deleted, that the words "or without prejudice to" should be inserted after the word "practice" in the third line, and that the word "for" in the third line should be deleted. The Workers' members did not accept this suggestion. The Government members of Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Lebanon, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Swaziland, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom supported the amendment, as subamended. The Government member of Lebanon considered that this amendment provided guarantees for both parties. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

250. Paragraph 18, as amended, was adopted.

251. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the word "right" by the word "opportunity". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson asserted that the word "right" had the connotation of an unqualified right which the worker could insist on exercising whatever the circumstances and therefore was totally inappropriate in this context. The amendment was designed to give the worker the opportunity to transfer to part-time work and return to full-time work in justified cases.

252. The amendment was supported by the Government members of China, Indonesia and Swaziland. However, it was opposed by the Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, Egypt, Finland, Japan, Malta, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the Syrian Arab Republic and the United States. The Government member of the United States observed that the word "right" was qualified by the expression "in justified cases" and that the current text was appropriate in a Recommendation. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic considered that the replacement of the word "right" would weaken the text considerably. The members of the Committee discussed replacing the words "be given the right to" by other words, such as "permitted", "be given the possibility", "should be able to," "entitled to", and finally "enabled to". The latter, "enabled to" was proposed by the Workers' members. This would cover various ways of enabling workers to transfer to part-time work and subsequently to return to full-time work, including collective or individual agreements and national law and practice. The Employers' and Government members agreed to this subamendment, which was adopted.

253. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words "family member" by the words "member of the worker's immediate family". The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the discussion which had already taken place on Paragraph 12 on the meaning of the expression "immediate family". The Workers' members agreed to the amendment, as the same terminology was used in the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention, 1982 (No. 156). However, the Workers' members suggested that the Paragraph should also incorporate the language that was used in Convention No. 156 and Recommendation No. 165 which referred to members of the worker's immediate family in need of care and support by the worker. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson considered that this was already implicit in the text of the Paragraph. The Workers' member agreed to the amendment on the understanding that the meaning of the Paragraph was in conformity with Convention No. 156. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

254. Paragraph 19, as amended, was adopted.

255. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace all the words after the words "part-time workers" by the following text:

> should be given the same weight as full-time workers; nevertheless, where appropriate part-time workers may be counted proportionately to their working time. Where such obligations refer to the protection mentioned in Article 4 of the Convention, part-time workers should be given full weight.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that Paragraph 20, as currently drafted, began by allowing for the possibility that part-time workers might be given unequal treatment, that is less weight. This was clearly contrary to the main objective of the proposed Convention and the Recommendation, which was to provide part-time workers with equal treatment, or at least equivalent treatment to that of comparable full-time workers. The basic principle was that part-time workers should be given the same weight as full-time workers. Where appropriate, they might be counted proportionately to their hours of work. If the phrase "less weight" were retained there was the possibility that part-time workers could be given no weight at all with the consequence that enterprises employing a large number of part-time workers could escape many obligations which were based on the number of workers. Moreover, the current text suggested that it would not be appropriate to give less weight to part-time workers for reasons of occupational safety and health, for example. However, in Article 4 of the proposed Convention, the Committee had accepted that the same protection should be accorded to part-time workers as to comparable full-time workers in respect of: the rights to organize, to bargain collectively and to act as workers' representatives; occupational safety and health; and discrimination in employment and occupation. It would therefore be totally contradictory for the Recommendation to give less weight to part-time workers, or even to count them on a proportional basis, in respect of rights for which the Convention gave them the same protection. In order to give expression to these rights, the related obligations upon employers, such as the acceptance of workers' representatives, needed to be treated in a similar fashion. The proposed amendment was therefore a logical consequence of the text adopted in the Convention.

256. Opposing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson reaffirmed that the Employers' members were not seeking to deny certain fundamental rights to part-time workers such as those in Article 4 of the Convention and did not argue that no weight at all should be given to part-time workers. Indeed, the Employers' members were prepared to accept the principle of proportionality, with the effect that proportional weight should be given to part-time workers. However, it was inappropriate for this provision to commence, as the proposed amendment did, with a reference to the same weight being given to part-time workers. Practical problems arose in establishing thresholds for works councils and health and safety committees, for example. He suggested that the phrase "but at least proportional to their hours of work in comparison with full-time workers" could be added in the current text of Paragraph 20 after the words "may be given less weight than".

257. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that this proposed wording only addressed part of the problem. It still retained the phrase "less weight". The rights set out in ILO Convention No. 87, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948, and Convention No. 98, the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, were so universal that they should apply to all workers. Part-time workers could not be given less treatment than full-time workers in respect of these rights. The Government member of Belgium, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, supported much of the intention behind the amendment. However, there were problems about the establishment of thresholds for works councils and other participatory bodies. These problems did not apply to the election of part-time workers as representatives on these bodies. He wondered whether the reference in the text could be confined to clauses (b) and (c) of Article 4 of the Convention.

258. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson could accept the limitation of the reference in the proposed amendment to Article 4(b) and (c). He emphasized that the principal problem concerned the obligation to establish works councils in establishments which employ more than a specified number of workers. The Workers' members did not agree to limiting the reference to certain parts of Article 4. Although, in respect of issues such as taxation and the payment of contributions, it made sense to take part-time workers into account on a proportional basis, the rights referred to in Article 4 were fundamental and had to be fully accorded to these workers. It was not possible to accept this principle in the Convention, and then to weaken it in the Recommendation by limiting the obligations upon employers.

259. The Government member of Canada, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Australia, Austria, Canada, the Czech Republic, Finland, New Zealand, Norway, Slovakia, Sweden, Turkey and the United States, emphasized that it was important to exclude all the elements contained in Article 4 from the principle of proportionality. The countries on behalf of whom she was speaking could support the amendment, or the addition of the phrase proposed to the current text by the Employers' members. The Government member of Cyprus observed that the amendment proposed by the Workers' members needed better drafting. The Chairperson noted that, in his opinion, Article 4 of the Convention referred to the protection to be afforded to workers in their individual capacity. However, Paragraph 20 of the Recommendation related to obligations on employers, which might depend on questions related to the number of their workers. The protection of the individual rights of part-time workers to act as workers' representatives was a separate issue from the determination of thresholds for the establishment of works councils. In the light of the above explanation, the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, the Netherlands, Spain and Switzerland supported the amendment. The Government member of Italy abstained. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also acknowledged the difference in the fields covered by Article 4 of the Convention and by this provision in the Recommendation. Nevertheless, she stressed that there was a clear relationship between an individual right to act as a workers' representative and the possibility of executing that right, through provisions that were imposed on employers by obligations such as those referred to in the proposed paragraph 20. In view of the explanation provided by the Chairperson concerning the meaning and effect of Article 4 of the Convention, and the statements of the above Government members, the Employers' members agreed to accept the majority position in support of the amendment and urged the Drafting Committee to examine carefully the text of the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

260. Paragraph 20, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 21

261. Paragraph 21 was adopted without change.

Adoption of the report and the proposed Convention and Recommendation

262. At its tenth sitting, the Committee adopted its report, subject to the changes requested by its members, and a proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning part-time work.

263. Before doing so, the Committee had been informed by the Reporter that, according to its mandate, the Drafting Committee had considered and made a number of drafting changes to the proposed Convention and Recommendation. Most of these were linguistic or stylistic and were aimed at ensuring that the two authentic texts coincided and that repetitions were avoided. In particular, she noted that in subparagraph (c) of Article 1 of the Convention, which defined the term "comparable full-time worker", the reference to "the part-time worker concerned" had been moved from clause (i) to after clause (iii) to ensure that it applied to the three clauses of the subparagraph. The same change had been made in Paragraph 2 of the Recommendation, so that the definitions contained in the two instruments were the same. In addition, the text of paragraph 1 of Article 8 of the Convention had been reorganized. The paragraph concerned the possibility of excluding part-time workers whose earnings or hours of work were below specified thresholds from the scope of any of the schemes referred to in Article 6 and any of the measures taken in the fields covered by Article 7. This had been found necessary to show separately in different clauses the exceptions to the exclusions in respect of Articles 6 and 7, which related respectively to employment injury benefits and maternity protection measures other than those provided under statutory social security schemes. In the Recommendation, as a result of the addition of a new paragraph after Paragraph 8, Paragraphs 9 to 21 had been renumbered. Finally, in renumbered Paragraph 21 of the Recommendation, the text had been redrafted without changing the substance. In the new formulation, part-time workers would be counted rather than given weight.

264. With reference to the proposed adoption by the International Labour Conference of a Convention and Recommendation on part-time work, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson noted that from the outset of the Committee's work the previous year, the Employers' members had expressed their firm opposition to the adoption of standards on part-time work. In a situation characterized by an unemployment crisis, priority had to be given to job creation rather than to the further regulation of working conditions. The Employers' members had tried to persuade the Committee to oppose the adoption of a Convention on part-time work but had failed. Had the Committee expressed such opposition, the Employers' members would have been able to support the adoption of a Recommendation. However, in a majority decision, the Committee had decided to retain the idea of adopting a Convention. In these circumstances, the Employers' members could not support the adoption of instruments on this subject. Although they recognized that, due to the work of the Committee, the texts of the proposed Convention and Recommendation were better than those originally placed before the Committee, the nature of the texts in question could not override the principle underlying the basic opposition of the Employers' members to the adoption of these instruments.

265. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson expressed satisfaction with the results of the Committee's work and the fact that the texts of the proposed instruments had been strengthened and were better balanced. However, the Workers' members were deeply disappointed that the Employers' members remained in opposition to the instruments on part-time work. The Workers' members and other members of the Committee had done their utmost to reach compromise positions toward the adoption of a flexible text which did not place bureaucratic or unnecessary obligations on employers or governments, but which nevertheless provided necessary protection for part-time workers. The opposition of the Employers' members was all the more disappointing in view of the fact that part-time work was such an important trend. Although employment creation was the first priority of workers, this was not contrary to providing protection to part-time workers, at least at the level provided to full-time workers, by the adoption of standards. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson thought that the Employers' members, after participating in the effort at reaching consensus and after having so many of their concerns taken into account, should show commitment to the outcome of the Committee's work. She likened their position to the process of having a suit tailor-made and then deciding not to take it. She hoped that the Employers' members would reflect on the solutions found by the Committee over the two years of its work and that some of them would change their minds and support the adoption of these instruments. She also hoped that support would be forthcoming from the Government members.

266. The Workers' deputy member of France, speaking on behalf of the French General Confederation of Workers (CGT), believed that the proposed instruments on part-time work did not adhere to long-standing ILO principles, especially its mandate in the Declaration of Philadelphia to promote social justice, respect for the rights of workers and the improvement of working conditions. Adopting the same logic as the instruments adopted in 1990 on night work, these texts in practice subjected the rights of workers to considerations of an economic nature. Irrespective of the current situation of high unemployment, the ILO must not abandon the objective of full employment, which needed to be reaffirmed in the instruments which it adopted. Full employment was not a Utopian objective. There were many unsatisfied needs in each country, including the most industrialized nations. Much effort was needed to achieve development throughout the world. Scientific and technical progress gave rise to many opportunities and it was increasingly unacceptable for men and women to be deprived of employment. The objective of full employment required full-time work to be the standard form of employment, although the work week could be shorter. She agreed that workers should be able to choose part-time work, but to do so they had to be protected and treated as real workers. Furthermore, the concept of free choice only made sense in the context of full employment with full-time work as the standard. The proposed instruments would permit employers and governments to encourage and develop part-time work to the point that it could become the standard form of employment. Part-time work was neither synonymous with full employment, nor was it effective in combatting unemployment or securing financial security. It merely replaced full-time employment and had the effect of increasing poverty, inequality, marginalization and exclusion. In the Year of the Family, 1994, it was contradictory to attempt to develop a form of employment which, except when it was freely chosen, was contrary to the interests of the family when it required workers to be totally flexible and available for work at any time. Workers still needed the ILO to continue in its role of setting standards and supporting workers' rights. Much remained to be done in this respect and the emergence of new methods of production gave rise to new obligations for the ILO. However, in view of the concept underlying the proposed instruments on part-time work, there were grounds for wondering whether the ILO was turning away from its role of promoting social justice to become an accessory to the rise in unemployment.

267. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that while each member of the Committee had the right to speak, it should be clearly understood that the Workers' deputy member from France was speaking solely on behalf of the CGT. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson added that she had stated the position of the Workers' members during the discussions.

268. In his final remarks on the work of the Committee, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson congratulated the Workers' Vice-Chairperson, the Reporter and the members of the Committee on the positive atmosphere in which the work of the Committee had been carried out. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also expressed her appreciation to the Employers' Vice-Chairperson, the Reporter and the members of the Committee. The Government member of Canada, as well as the Government member of Greece, speaking on behalf of the Government members of the Member States of the European Union, associated themselves with the above comments. These members also appreciated the excellent manner in which the representative of the Secretary-General and his staff had supported the work of the Committee. In particular, these members paid special tribute to the manner in which the Chairperson had guided the work of the Committee over the past two years. His wisdom, fairness, intelligence and humour had been exemplary. They also congratulated him on his work over the years in the context of the ILO and the magnificent way in which he had represented his country. Noting that this would be the last occasion on which he would represent the Government of the Netherlands in the International Labour Conference, they wished him every success and happiness in his future life and work.

269. In reply, the Chairperson thanked the members of the Committee for the attitude with which they had approached their work and the spirit of consensus which had prevailed during their debates. He gave particular thanks to the Vice-Chairpersons and the Secretariat.

270. The report of the Committee and the proposed Convention and Recommendation on part-time work are submitted for consideration.

Proposed Convention concerning part-time work

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 81st Session on 7 June 1994, and

Noting the relevance, for part-time workers, of the provisions of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, and the Workers with Family Responsibilities Convention and Recommendation, 1981, and

Noting the relevance for these workers of the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984, and

Recognizing the importance of productive and freely chosen employment for all workers, the economic importance of part-time work, the need for employment policies to take into account the role of part-time work in facilitating additional employment opportunities, and the need to ensure protection for part-time workers in the areas of access to employment, working conditions and social security, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to part-time work, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention;

adopts this ...... day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-four the following Convention, which may be cited as the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994:

Article 1

For the purposes of this Convention:

(a) the term "part-time worker" means an employed person whose normal hours of work are less than those of comparable full-time workers;

(b) the normal hours of work referred to in subparagraph (a) may be calculated weekly or on average over a given period of employment;

(c) the term "comparable full-time worker" refers to a full-time worker who:

  (i) has the same type of employment relationship;

  (ii) is engaged in the same or a similar type of work or occupation; and

  (iii) is employed in the same establishment or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that establishment, in the same enterprise or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that enterprise, in the same branch of activity,

as the part-time worker concerned;

(d) full-time workers affected by partial unemployment, that is by a collective and temporary reduction in their normal hours of work for economic, technical or structural reasons, are not considered to be part-time workers.

Article 2

This Convention does not affect more favourable provisions applicable to part-time workers under other international labour Conventions.

Article 3

1. This Convention applies to all part-time workers, it being understood that a Member may, after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, exclude wholly or partly from its scope particular categories of workers or of establishments when its application to them would raise particular problems of a substantial nature.

2. Each Member having ratified this Convention which avails itself of the possibility afforded in the preceding paragraph shall, in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, indicate any particular category of workers or of establishments thus excluded and the reasons why this exclusion was or is still judged necessary.

Article 4

Measures shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive the same protection as that accorded to comparable full-time workers in respect of:

(a) the right to organize, the right to bargain collectively and the right to act as workers' representatives;

(b) occupational safety and health;

(c) discrimination in employment and occupation.

Article 5

Measures appropriate to national law and practice shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers do not, solely because they work part time, receive a basic wage which, calculated proportionately on an hourly, performance-related, or piece-rate basis, is lower than the basic wage of comparable full-time workers, calculated according to the same method.

Article 6

Statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity shall be adapted so that part-time workers enjoy conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers; these conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions or earnings, or through other methods consistent with national law and practice.

Article 7

Measures shall be taken to ensure that part-time workers receive conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers in the fields of:

(a) maternity protection;

(b) termination of employment;

(c) paid annual leave and paid public holidays; and

(d) sick leave,

it being understood that pecuniary entitlements may be determined in proportion to hours of work or earnings.

Article 8

1. Part-time workers whose hours of work or earnings are below specified thresholds may be excluded by a Member:

(a) from the scope of any of the statutory social security schemes referred to in Article 6, except in regard to employment injury benefits;

(b) from the scope of any of the measures taken in the fields covered by Article 7, except in regard to maternity protection measures other than those provided under statutory social security schemes.

2. The thresholds referred to in paragraph 1 shall be sufficiently low as not to exclude an unduly large percentage of part-time workers.

3. A Member which avails itself of the possibility provided for in paragraph 1 above shall:

(a) periodically review the thresholds in force;

(b) in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, indicate the thresholds in force, the reasons therefor and whether consideration is being given to the progressive extension of protection to the workers excluded.

4. The most representative organizations of employers and workers shall be consulted on the establishment, review and revision of the thresholds referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 above.

Article 9

1. Measures shall be taken to facilitate access to productive and freely chosen part-time work which meets the needs of both employers and workers, provided that the protection referred to in Articles 4 to 7 is ensured.

2. These measures shall include:

(a) the review of laws and regulations that may prevent or discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work;

(b) the use of employment services, where they exist, to identify and publicize possibilities for part-time work in their information and placement activities;

(c) special attention, in employment policies, to the needs and preferences of specific groups such as the unemployed, workers with family responsibilities, older workers, workers with disabilities and workers undergoing education or training.

3. These measures may also include research and dissemination of information on the degree to which part-time work responds to the economic and social aims of employers and workers.

Article 10

Where appropriate, measures shall be taken to ensure that transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa is voluntary, in accordance with national law and practice.

Article 11

The provisions of this Convention shall be implemented by laws or regulations, except in so far as effect is given to them by means of collective agreements or in any other manner consistent with national practice. The most representative organizations of employers and workers shall be consulted before any such laws or regulations are adopted.

Proposed Recommendation concerning part-time work

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its 81st Session on 7 June 1994, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to part-time work, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994;

adopts this .... day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-four the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Part-Time Work Recommendation, 1994:

1. The provisions of this Recommendation should be considered in conjunction with those of the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (hereafter referred to as "the Convention").

2. For the purposes of this Recommendation:

(a) the term "part-time worker" means an employed person whose normal hours of work are less than those of comparable full-time workers;

(b) the normal hours of work referred to in clause (a) may be calculated weekly or on average over a given period of employment;

(c) the term "comparable full-time worker" refers to a full-time worker who:

- (i) has the same type of employment relationship;
- (ii) is engaged in the same or a similar type of work or occupation; and
- (iii) is employed in the same establishment or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that establishment, in the same enterprise or, when there is no comparable full-time worker in that enterprise, in the same branch of activity,

as the part-time worker concerned;

(d) full-time workers affected by partial unemployment, that is by a collective and temporary reduction in their normal hours of work for economic, technical or structural reasons, are not considered to be part-time workers.

3. This Recommendation applies to all part-time workers.

4. In accordance with national law and practice, employers should consult the representatives of the workers concerned on the introduction or extension of part-time work on a broad scale, on the rules and procedures applying to such work and on the protective and promotional measures that may be appropriate.

5. Part-time workers should be informed of their specific conditions of employment in writing or by any other means consistent with national law and practice.

6. The adaptations to be made in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention to statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity should aim at:

(a) if appropriate, progressively reducing threshold requirements based on earnings or hours of work as a condition for coverage by these schemes;

(b) as appropriate, granting to part-time workers minimum or flat-rate benefits, in particular old-age, sickness, invalidity and maternity benefits, as well as family allowances;

(c) accepting in principle that part-time workers whose employment has come to an end or been suspended and who are seeking only part-time employment meet the condition of availability for work required for the payment of unemployment benefits;

(d) reducing the risk that part-time workers may be penalized by schemes which:

  (i) subject the right to benefits to a qualifying period, expressed in terms of periods of contribution, of insurance or of employment during a given reference period; or

  (ii) fix the amount of benefits by reference both to the average of former earnings and to the length of the periods of contribution, of insurance or of employment.

7. (1) Where appropriate, threshold requirements for access to coverage under private occupational schemes which supplement or replace statutory social security schemes should be progressively reduced to allow part-time workers to be covered as widely as possible.

(2) Part-time workers should be protected by such schemes under conditions equivalent to those of comparable full-time workers. Where appropriate, these conditions may be determined in proportion to hours of work, contributions or earnings.

8. (1) As appropriate, threshold requirements based on hours of work or earnings as specified under Article 8 of the Convention in the fields referred to in its Article 7 should be progressively reduced.

(2) The periods of service required as a condition for protection in the fields referred to in Article 7 of the Convention should not be longer for part-time workers than for comparable full-time workers.

9. Where part-time workers have more than one job, their total hours of work, contributions or earnings should be taken into account in determining whether they meet threshold requirements in statutory social security schemes which are based on occupational activity.

10. Part-time workers should benefit on an equitable basis from financial compensation, additional to basic wages, which is received by comparable full-time workers.

11. All appropriate measures should be taken to ensure that as far as practicable part-time workers have access on an equitable basis to the welfare facilities and social services of the establishment concerned; these facilities and services should, to the extent possible, be adapted to take into account the needs of part-time workers.

12. (1) The number and scheduling of hours of work of part-time workers should be established taking into account the interests of the worker as well as the needs of the establishment.

(2) As far as possible, changes in the agreed work schedule and work beyond scheduled hours should be subject to restrictions and to prior notice.

(3) The system of compensation for work beyond the agreed work schedule should be subject to negotiations in accordance with national law and practice.

13. In accordance with national law and practice, part-time workers should have access on an equitable basis, and as far as possible under equivalent conditions, to all forms of leave available to comparable full-time workers, in particular paid educational leave, parental leave and leave in cases of illness of a child or another member of a worker's immediate family.

14. Where appropriate, the same rules should apply to part-time workers as to comparable full-time workers with respect to scheduling of annual leave and work on customary rest days and public holidays.

15. Where appropriate, measures should be taken to overcome specific constraints on the access of part-time workers to training, career opportunities and occupational mobility.

16. Provisions of statutory social security schemes based on occupational activity that may discourage recourse to or acceptance of part-time work should be adapted, in particular those which:

(a) result in proportionately higher contributions for part-time workers unless these are justified by corresponding proportionately higher benefits;

(b) without reasonable grounds, significantly reduce the unemployment benefits of unemployed workers who temporarily accept part-time work;

(c) overemphasize, in the calculation of old-age benefits, the reduced income from part-time work undertaken solely during the period preceding retirement.

17. Measures should be considered by employers to facilitate access to part-time work at all levels of the enterprise, including skilled and managerial positions where appropriate.

18. (1) Where appropriate, employers should give consideration to:

(a) requests by workers for transfer from full-time to part-time work that becomes available in the enterprise; and

(b) requests by workers for transfer from part-time to full-time work that becomes available in the enterprise.

(2) Employers should provide timely information to the workers on the availability of part-time and full-time positions in the establishment, in order to facilitate transfers from full-time to part-time work or vice versa.

19. A worker's refusal to transfer from full-time to part-time work or vice versa should not in itself constitute a valid reason for termination of employment, without prejudice to termination, in accordance with national law and practice, for other reasons such as may arise from the operational requirements of the establishment concerned.

20. Where national or establishment-level conditions permit, workers should be enabled to transfer to part-time work in justified cases, such as pregnancy or the need to care for a young child or a disabled or sick member of a worker's immediate family, and subsequently to return to full-time work.

21. Where obligations on employers depend on the number of the workers they employ, part-time workers should be counted as full-time workers. Nevertheless, where appropriate, part-time workers may be counted proportionately to their hours of work, it being understood that where such obligations refer to the protection mentioned in Article 4 of the Convention, they should be counted as full-time workers.

22. Information should be disseminated on the protective measures that apply to part-time work and on practical arrangements for various part-time work schemes.

ELEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this morning is the eleventh report of the Selection Committee, which you can find in Provisional Record No. 3K.

I would like to submit this report to you for adoption. If there are no objections, I shall take it that this report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the consideration and adoption of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

I am pleased to ask Mr. Balopi, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Hernandez, Employers' adviser, Philippines, Employer Vice-Chairman; Mr. Brett, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom, Worker Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Jonzon, Government delegate, Sweden, Reporter of the Committee, to come to the rostrum.

I invite Mr. Jonzon to submit the report to the Conference.

Mr. JONZON (Government delegate, Sweden; Reporter of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – I have the honour to present to this session of the International Labour Conference the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

At an historical moment such as this I think it is more appropriate for people other than the Reporter to speak. In this room, there are women and men with their own experience of apartheid. There are others who for many years, inside and outside the ILO, have fought against apartheid. Like you, I want to listen to them.

Further, the report on the deliberations, proceedings and conclusions of the Committee is tabled before you and there is no need for me to repeat here what is in it. Therefore I will be brief and highlight a few things only.

I would like to read out the first operative paragraph in the resolution annexed to the report. It reads, "The General Conference of the International Labour Organization (...) rescinds forthwith the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa adopted by the International Labour Conference on 8 July 1964 and revised on 18 June 1981, 16 June 1988 and 20 June 1991, and consequently decides to dissolve forthwith the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid."

The reason is that the system of apartheid is now dead!

The following paragraphs contain a plea to the ILO to work closely with, and to assist, the tripartite community of South Africa on a wide range of important matters within the broad fields of responsibility of the Organization.

The resolution also gives the ILO a clear mandate to cooperate and to coordinate their efforts with those of other United Nations agencies and donors for the total elimination of the consequences of apartheid. The ILO now has a crucial role to play in South Africa and in neighbouring countries, as the evil of apartheid also had severe implications outside the country. In essence, the conclusions form an imperative for action and they give the ILO a mandate and a broad agenda for its future work.

I want to underline very clearly that the report and the resolution were worked out and agreed upon by the Committee without a single vote, either in the Committee or in the Working Party. In addition, there are no reservations. A very important reason for this was the deep commitment demonstrated by the whole Committee combined with the unfailing wisdom of our Chairman and two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Balopi, Mr. Hernandez and Mr. Brett.

A second reason was an outstanding secretariat of which I will mention three names only. The representative of the Secretary-General Mr. Abdel-Rahman, Mr. Swepston, and Mrs. Hodges, although many others, either on or behind the scenes, should also have been mentioned. I would like to add for your information and as a further sign of the dedication of all those involved in the work, that I have been told that the interpreters have for years volunteered to work for the Committee on Apartheid.

On behalf of the whole Committee I want to express my thanks to each and every one of the people I have referred to.

However, I personally think that an additional reason for the atmosphere that has made it possible to reach a unanimous decision, is the presence and the very active participation of the tripartite delegation from South Africa and the fact that all Employers', Workers' and Government delegates in the Committee took into their hearts the words spoken by Nelson Mandela in this room four years ago. He called upon all of us to walk the last mile together. The Committee followed his wise appeal.

The very impressive fact that a person who has been imprisoned for almost three decades shows no bitterness but creates hope for us all through his unfailing work for justice, equality and solidarity on the basis of cooperation and understanding, is something for which we are humbly grateful. It is a source of strength to us all, urging us to continue to work for the good of all those people who in various parts of the world are today suffering from poverty, aggression and violence.

South Africa, welcome home, we have been waiting for you.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. BRETT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Worker Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – My first task here is to express our most sincere gratitude to the Chairperson of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid, Mr. Balopi, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of the Republic of Botswana. He presided over our work with the Committee most efficiently and admirably. I would also like to thank Mr. Jonzon, Reporter of the Committee and Chairperson of the Working Party, who had the unenviable task of putting together not only the report but also a compromise position acceptable to all three partners in the Committee.

May I also express our gratitude to Mr. Hernandez, the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and to his colleagues in the Employers' group. It is obvious that their cooperation was essential, and their sense of duty in the task of reaching a successful conclusion has been immensely helpful.

As members of the Committee will testify, the work of the Committee on this occasion was carried out without acrimony and the report before you was adopted unanimously. What is more, no vote was ever taken at any stage of the deliberations.

The elections held in South Africa that produced a first democratic government were a triumph for all of us. There were many international observers during the election process. The ICFTU and its affiliates and the ITS alone had more than 200 observers who followed the elections closely in most major employment centres. The international observers recognized the logistical problems that the process faced, but they were also unanimous in their conclusion that the voting process had been free and fair and that the outcome represented the will of the South African people. The outcome of the election is of course known, and the subsequent developments are also a matter of public knowledge. We must, however, congratulate the South African people for the peaceful manner in which the elections were conducted. The fear of widespread violence during the voting process proved groundless. We must also congratulate President Nelson Mandela on being unanimously elected President of the new non-racial and democratic South Africa and on establishing a Government of national unity. It is a very promising start, and we urge the international community to support his policies.

As we rejoice at having reached this stage, a stage we believe that ushers in an era of irreversible change, it is perhaps too easy to forget what it has taken to reach this particular point. Without going back and recounting all the difficulties of the apartheid era, I have to say that we should recognize that it has taken a long time to eradicate apartheid, too long in fact, and a lot of sacrifices have had to be made. Many people have paid a heavy price, some have even given their lives to bring about the downfall of the apartheid system. The Sharpeville massacres in 1960 of peaceful demonstrators against the pass laws, or the 1976 massacres of Soweto school children whose crime it was simply to refuse to be instructed through the language of the so-called "master race" are not isolated incidents, nor is the slaughter of refugees in Lesotho in 1982 and in several other countries in Southern Africa. In the dark days of apartheid, no opponent of this evil system was safe. Indeed, no one was safe as an opponent anywhere in the world. We know, of course, that many others suffered greatly in South Africa's prisons. If you were against apartheid, you were either on a list to be killed or to be imprisoned. There are those who endured long terms of imprisonment. Some came back maimed, others perished because of brutal and barbaric assaults and torture. This is a period of human history we wish never existed, and must never be repeated.

Now, not only we here but many people across the world, share the joy of the South African people over having put an end to this sad chapter in their history, and having done it through the ballot box. Let me also pay tribute to the many people and organizations outside South Africa who quite clearly played a significant role in the defeat of the apartheid system. Apartheid was seen by many people and many organizations throughout the world, rightly so, as a crime against humanity.

Thirty-three years ago, the ILO made its home unwelcome for South Africa to continue its membership, so South Africa was forced to leave our Organization. The ILO did not just criticize the apartheid system, but went on to set up machinery to follow up its policies and recommendations with action, and to ensure that its decisions were implemented. Unlike others who were content in issuing resolutions, the ILO took practical steps to ensure that the apartheid system was condemned, isolated and defeated. The decision of the ILO to have a special report at each Conference dealing with the apartheid system, and the subsequent setting up of a Committee on Action against Apartheid, are some of the most farsighted decisions taken anywhere in the fight against that evil system. Those of us who spent some time reading the special reports of the Conference over the years and the conclusions of the work of the Conference Committee, cannot fail to be moved by its work and by its effort. This work, in my view, makes the ILO the unequivocal moral conscience of humanity. It inspired people across the world and gave hope to millions of people who are victims of the apartheid system.

Thus the ILO's role in the fight against apartheid is an honourable one. It can derive much satisfaction in that its stand has been fully vindicated. And if the ILO made an important contribution in this field, it is because above all it remained true to its founding principles, especially its tripartite character. In this respect I would like to pay a sincere tribute to those who had the vision and the courage to stand up against the apologists of the evil system, and the mad men in Pretoria, who represented their evil ventures as "the very epitome of civilized behaviour". An arrogant and nonsensical statement if there ever was one.

Although apartheid has been defeated at the ballot box, after over three decades in existence, its legacy will be with us for many years to come. It is with this in mind that the Committee is placing before you the resolution that clearly spells out the need for the ILO to take urgent action to consult with the social partners in South Africa, thus ensuring that all appropriate action is taken to bring about the implementation of the ILO's plan of action. Among the issues needing urgent attention will no doubt be the development of tripartite structures, capacity-building for employers' and workers' organizations and the updating of labour legislation. But above all, there is a clear need for a comprehensive programme of workers' educational activities at all levels. The trade union movement in South Africa, and in particular COSATU and NACTU, played a major role in the fight against apartheid and in the building of democratic structures. As the country enters the traditional process to full democracy, it is important that the trade union movement continues to play an equally active role.

Nelson Mandela, speaking from this very rostrum some few years ago, told us that the transformation we all seek to achieve in South Africa will need more resources because, as he said, "it will be necessary to repair the damage caused by the apartheid system, both in South Africa and in the rest of Southern Africa".

It has to be remembered that, in spite of its resources, unemployment in South Africa is extremely high. Perhaps as many as half the total labour force is unemployed, a majority of whom are young people living in urban areas, where alternative job opportunities barely exist. A large part of the South African population is illiterate and the shortage of housing in urban areas has to be seen to be believed. Access to clean water, education and health facilities in rural areas is also limited. The task is not only to provide physical infrastructure; it is also to ensure that resources, both human and material, are fully mobilized and systematically deployed. In some cases, it means that the limited human resources available are switched from one sector to another. A typical situation is the development and deployment of key personnel. As the State seeks to build up its social and physical infrastructure, in order to develop and carry on its policies effectively, social partners, such as the trade unions, are likely to experience a political shortage of key personnel as some of its senior members are called upon directly to participate in the process.

It is a mammoth task and requires the support of the international community. In this respect, the ILO and its constituent bodies can play a major and significant supportive role in the transitional process. The ILO as an organization, perhaps more than any other, is uniquely placed to give this support. It has the experience and expertise that South Africa can call upon; it has above all the concerns of the people at heart; and it has, through practical work, built for itself a high reputation. It is our hope that the ILO should take up this challenge, not only by mobilizing its own resources, but by encouraging others to support South Africa's plans for reconstruction and development.

The resolution which I am commending to you for support reflects the wishes and aspirations of South Africa's working people as well as those of the other social partners. It has been carefully worked out to take account of the various interests and, as I said earlier on, the Committee concluded its work on a smooth note. I urge you to support the report and the resolution, and to adopt them unanimously.

Finally, I wish to join in thanking all the members of the Committee, the Secretary-General's representative, Mr. Abdel-Rahman, and all his colleagues from the secretariat, as well as the interpreters, for their dedicated commitment and very able support which was appreciated by all of us.

When it comes to a moment in history that you never expected to be part of, it gives great pleasure. But the real pleasure will be, for me at least and for the Workers' group, to know that the ILO is not abandoning South Africa. It will continue to give support. As we enter a new era, the ILO has a great part to play, just as it has played through this Committee, and we therefore support the resolutions and dissolve this Committee but do so on a joyful note and not a sad one. We wish everyone in South Africa the best of luck.

Mr. HERNANDEZ (Employers' adviser, Philippines; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – On behalf of the Employers' group in general, and the Employers' Confederation of the Philippines in particular, permit me to enjoy the personal luxury of extending to you, the President our most profound felicitations on his well-deserved election to the post he now occupies and on the efficient manner with which he is directing the proceedings of this session of the Conference.

Our warm congratulations are also conveyed to the elected Vice-Presidents, and particularly to Mr. Mendoza, our dear compatriot whose election to the position is a source of unabashed pride indeed for our entire delegation.

I would like to associate myself with Mr. Jonzon, the Reporter of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and Mr. Brett, the Workers' spokesman and Vice-Chairman of the Committee, in requesting from all the delegates attending this 81st Session of the International Labour Conference their unanimous and unconditional support for the adoption and approval of the Committee's report and resolution, which appears in Provisional Record No. 17.

The primary task of the Committee, as mandated by the Governing Body, was to review the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which was first adopted in 1964 and updated in 1981, 1988 and 1991, and to come to a decision to recommend to this Conference that the Declaration be rescinded and the Committee dissolved.

The concatenation and congruence of salutatory events in South Africa, the expansion of the democratic horizon and the establishment of the frontiers of freedom in that great country provided the Committee with the wherewithal to conclude without any acrimony, reservation or condition at all that the Declaration has become totally irrelevant and has to be rescinded immediately. As a Corollary to this, the Committee, as I personally predicted last year, has resolved to recommend to the Conference that it be dismantled and abolished forthwith.

As South Africa enters the initial stage of the post-apartheid era, there is an imperative need for the ILO and the international community to lend unstinted support to the adoption and implementation of appropriate and necessary measures, in line with the process of reconstruction and development of South Africa. In this regard, the resolution contained in the report invites the Governing Body to instruct the Director-General to adapt, in consultation with the tripartite constituents in South Africa, the plan of action approved by the Governing Body of the social and economic development needs of the new South Africa, with particular emphasis on such matters as the promotion of trade union and human rights, capacity-building for employers' and workers' organizations, employment creation, promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises, reform and restructuring of labour market institutions and labour administration, labour relations and collective bargaining, the effective use of all factors of production, the improvement of labour legislation and upgrading of labour standards, the improvement of working and living conditions in the rural areas and for farm workers, education and training, and in particular vocational training, human resources development and management training, occupational health and safety and the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment.

During this session of the International Labour Conference we are celebrating two historic, memorable occasions: one involving life, and another concerning death.

The 75th anniversary of this noble Organization is indeed a cause for rejoicing, as we recall its brilliant past and earnestly hope that it will continue to live on and on, to serve much more ably the cause of the toiling masses of the world under the aegis of freedom, of industrial peace and social justice.

We also celebrate, the demise of the Committee on Action against Apartheid which has, of course, contributed in no small measure to the total elimination and eradication of a political system that for years unashamedly rejected the principles enshrined in the Declaration of Philadelphia. The Committee on Action against Apartheid is now gasping for its final breath as it awaits the last nail in its coffin. As we bid the Committee farewell, the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid will be consigned to the dustbin of history. This is a fitting testimonial to the unrelenting and patient efforts of the International Labour Organization and its tripartite constituents, including the International Organization of Employers, to eliminate exclusion and discrimination in South Africa and to strengthen their affirmation of and fidelity to the principle that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material development and spiritual upliftment in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity.

As we commend the Committee's report and resolution for unanimous vote and acclamation, may we, once again pay special tribute to Mr. Nelson Mandela and Mr. F.W. de Klerk, the principal linchpins in the elimination of apartheid in South Africa, humble and unselfish heroes of this century who any without doubt did indeed deserve the Nobel Peace Prize. May the good Lord grant them and all South Africans the best of His blessings.

Finally, we extend most profoundly our thanks and appreciation to the officers of the Committee, to the Honourable Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of Botswana, Mr. Balopi, to Mr. Brett, the Workers' spokesman and Vice-Chairman of the Committee, to Mr. Jonzon, the Reporter, and to the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Abdel- Rahman, and all the members of his staff and all the members of the Committee for formulating and adopting the Committee's report in the highest spirit of oneness, international camaraderie, understanding and solidarity. This report was much easier to formulate than reports in previous years, when we had to make reservations in the final report, in view of certain constraints being experienced by some of the employers of the world. This unanimity was found because there was virtually a congruence of the points of view of the tripartite partners in the Committee concerning the events that have taken place, and this the report easy to formulate.

Once again, farewell to the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid. Farewell to the Committee on Action against Apartheid. Our work has indeed been a rewarding experience.

Mr. P.K. BALOPI (Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana; Chairman of the Committee on Action against Apartheid) – I think it is only proper that I hasten to express my depth of appreciation to all those who worked so hard and with such a great degree of diligence and dedication to produce this report that we are discussing this morning. Here I include the two Vice-Chairpersons, the Chairperson of the Working Party, the members of the secretariat and, indeed, the members of the Committee itself.

It was with a sense of honour and a genuine appreciation of the historic importance of the timing that I chaired the 1994 session of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid in South Africa. If this august assembly agrees with the Committee's report and resolution annexed thereto, it will help, being the last meeting of the Committee.

And rightly so, as we have witnessed over the last months the final dismantling of apartheid and the measures to create a new South Africa, free, democratic and based on respect for all South Africans irrespective of race. My country, Botswana, and I are particularly sensitive to this remarkable victory of the popular will, given the historic part that Botswana has played against apartheid in South Africa and since our two countries have so much in common, for not only do we share the longest common frontier but our peoples are also related and therefore share common cultures and traditions. We are also both members of our common customs agreement.

As I pointed out in the Committee, at the regional level Botswana played a significant role in the liberation of South Africa by promoting a spirit of reconciliation and mutual understanding. We unreservedly and despite our vulnerability advocated the promotion of a non-racial and democratic South Africa. At the international level as well, Botswana did not shy away from pushing for change. Several of my predecessors spoke out in the early years of this Conference Committee with unreserved condemnation of the apartheid system.

To the other African governments and to all who worked so hard, we wish to say that we all shared the struggle and we can all say "This has been a job well done!"

But the efforts for South Africa do not end here. As our Committee's resolution notes, much needs to be done to eliminate the legacy of apartheid. The ILO is called upon to play a major role in this respect, as are the member States of the Organization, particularly in the effort to find resources for the technical assistance needed for South Africa's social reconstruction. I appeal for just such strong support from the ILO's plan of action to redress the effect of apartheid as was shown in the efforts to get rid of that system itself. I hope this appeal will be heard, particularly in September this year when the ILO takes part in an International Donors' Conference on Human Resource Development for a Post-Apartheid South Africa to be held in Johannesburg and organized by the United Nations Development Programme and the Commonwealth.

The Committee on Action against Apartheid has reviewed the Special Report of the Director-General on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and the supplement to that Special Report. It now advises the Conference to rescind the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and to dissolve the Committee itself.

The resolution also calls for follow-up action and my Government commends these decisions to this Conference. Let our decision here be a fitting end to our efforts in the ILO and a continuation to the joyful development in South Africa.

Mr. SUNMONU (representative, Organization of African Trade Union Unity) – Please permit me, on behalf of African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and myself, to congratulate the Director-General for his Special Report on the Review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, and also to the Chairman and members of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for their excellent report.

The ILO and its tripartite constituents have reason to be justifiably proud of their immense contribution to the destruction of apartheid. The ILO has done more than any United Nations agency in terms of concrete and practical steps taken to fight apartheid.

African workers and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity heartily congratulate President Nelson Mandela, the Government and people of South Africa for their successful transition from apartheid oppression to multi-party, non-racial and democratic government. The heroic patience, forbearance and forgiveness of the black majority in spite of decades of apartheid crime against humanity, epitomized by President Nelson Mandela, is the legacy the black peoples of South Africa have given to the world. It is a good example that people of Rwanda, Burundi and Bosnia have to emulate.

May I ask your indulgence for a minute's silence in memory of the victims of apartheid who lost their lives in their struggles against it.

(A minute's silence is observed.)

Mr. SUNMONU – Thank you all.

With the death of apartheid, the concern of the ILO and its constituents should shift to the reconstruction of the social and economic destruction caused by it to the majority of South Africans. A comprehensive programme to help the disadvantaged communities, in the areas of basic needs, such as education and training, housing, water, electricity and employment, is urgently required. The ILO should assist in mobilizing international support and assistance to the new Government of South Africa in order to consolidate its young democracy and promote the empowerment of its people.

The ILO's technical assistance to South Africa should be aimed principally at the development of human resources and capacity building of its tripartite constituents, especially the workers' and employers' organizations. South African workers and trade unions should also be assisted by the ILO in the areas of: workers' education, vocational training, industrial relations, labour legislation, employment-generation strategies, management training and international labour standards.

Fellowships should be given by the ILO for the intensive training of South African trade union leaders to replace those that answered the call of duty in government and industry.

The Organization of African Trade Union Unity is proud of the role African workers and trade unions and their counterparts throughout the world played in the fight against apartheid. The pressure workers and trade unions brought on governments and employers worldwide in a positive display of unity and solidarity contributed immensely to the success story of today's democratic South Africa. We should all continue to display the same unity and solidarity for the reconstruction of post-apartheid democratic South Africa.

We heartily welcome South Africa back into the ILO and look forward to it playing an active and constructive part in the work of the ILO.

We congratulate the ILO and its tripartite constituents for a job very well done in the fight against, and the destruction of, apartheid. We support and call for the unanimous adoption of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa.

Long live peace, democracy, social and economic justice.

Mr. KAILEMBO (representative, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions) – On behalf of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, representing 120 million members throughout the world, I would like to express my true support for the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid as contained in Provisional Record No. 17. I very much hope that the report and the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa, which is annexed to the report, will be unanimously adopted by the Conference.

At a time when the ILO is celebrating its 75th anniversary, the unanimous adoption of the report would be a timely gift and a recognition of the ILO's relentless efforts in the struggle against apartheid.

Of course, the democratic political development in South Africa should be welcomed. In the light of the installation of a government of national unity, following the democratic elections that took place on 27-29 April and the subsequent unanimous election on 9 May of Mr. Nelson Mandela as President of the Republic of South Africa, it became obvious that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid had to be welcomed. This is what should be done after all. The Republic of South Africa has now been readmitted as a full member of the ILO. But it has taken too long, far too long, to bring about the downfall of the apartheid system. For many people today's session is the culmination a lifelong commitment to fighting what has rightly been described as a "crime against humanity".

I would like to congratulate warmly the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr. Balopi, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of the Republic of Botswana, and also the two Vice-Chairpersons for the Employers and the Workers, Mr. Hernandez and Mr. Brett, for steering the Committee to a most successful conclusion.

I would also like to extend my congratulations to the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Abdel-Rahman, and other members of staff for their diligent work. The adoption of the report and the resolution will effectively dissolve the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid and rescind the Declaration on Action against Apartheid. This will close an era of more than three decades of intensive work against apartheid, during which the Republic of South Africa was prevailed upon to withdraw its membership from the ILO.

The ICFTU has all along supported the struggle against apartheid. Through its Coordinating Committee on South Africa, which was set up in the 1970s and which met twice every year, it focused on building and strengthening black trade unions in South Africa and building trade-union capacity to defend and protect workers' rights. In the early 1970s, when black workers had to hold union meetings in churches and in minibuses, because of the Riotous Assemblies Act which prevented more than three Africans from meeting together at any one time, the ICFTU was able to provide some minibuses to help workers to organize. In the early 1980's the ICFTU adopted a sanctions policy and campaigned relentlessly for total isolation of South Africa, politically, economically and culturally. Considerable resources were also devoted to fighting the cases of those who became victims of pernicious apartheid laws through international trade union solidarity. The treason trial of Moses Mayekiso in 1987, is one of many examples. On any occasion when there was an industrial dispute, which often ended with the arrest and imprisonment of those seen as its leaders, we sent clear messages to the apartheid regime, to show them that, in the struggle against apartheid, the workers of South Africa were not alone. Over the years, we have constantly been reminded by the heroic struggles the workers waged: the Durban strikes in 1973; the meat-workers' strike in Cape Town in 1980; the Sasol strike in 1986; the struggle of workers at pain to win recognition of their union, which took a decade to be settled; the BTR strike in the 1980s, the railway workers' strike in 1989; and of course the miners' strikes, especially that of 1987, are but a few cases to remind us of the sacrifices the workers made in the struggle against the apartheid system. The desire of a people to be free is indeed eternal. It can be suppressed, but no force can extinguish it.

Last year, when the Conference was in session, it was still uncertain whether the elections would be held as had been agreed. There was the ongoing violence on the one hand; on the other hand, the major negotiating parties had not agreed on the transitional machinery to oversee and administer the elections. The situation changed dramatically towards the end of the year. The Transitional Executive Council was established in December, and it was quickly followed by the establishment of the Independent Electoral Commission.

As the country's main focus shifted towards preparations for the elections, the ICFTU observer group on violence, which was established last year by ICFTU affiliates working closely with COSATU and NACTU, also followed this trend. The ICFTU readily changed its terms of reference and placed its expertise at the service of the non-racial democratic trade unions. In this respect, the group assisted in the orientation of over 200 international trade union observers during the elections and ensured that they were deployed in accordance with the wishes of COSATU and NACTU.

In spite of the fact that negotiations were protracted and that violence intensified with a view to derailing the negotiation and election process, the downfall of the apartheid government took place in a relatively peaceful atmosphere. Fears that the elections might be disrupted proved groundless, although some attempts were made by what we believed to have been right-wing forces. But the police quickly rounded up the alleged perpetrators, and the situation was brought back to normal. South Africans of all races embraced their newly won freedom with both hands; they turned out in large numbers to vote, and they were patient, as they were enthusiastic; even when some of them had to wait the whole day to cast their ballot papers. Thus, the resources made available from various sources including ICFTU and the ILO itself, in voter education for working people and especially COSATU and NACTU, played a significant part in mobilizing voters. The non-racial democratic trade union movement, in particular COSATU and its affiliates, played a key role in the mobilization of voters at the grassroots level, and in ensuring that there was massive turnout on voting days. The ICFTU and its affiliates, together with the International Trade Secretariats, which had sent more than 200 international observers to South Africa to be deployed in cooperation with COSATU and NACTU, were immensely impressed with the large turnout of voters. They were clearly more than happy to confirm that the vote had been free and fair. The presence of international observers was highly appreciated, not only by the trade union movement, but also by political leaders and election administrators. It was said that the large participation of international observers helped to minimise violence and to guarantee the integrity of the election process.

The trade union movement has not restricted its participation to mobilizing for change. It seeks to participate in the process of change itself. This is why some of its leading officials are now in the legislative bodies at national and provincial levels. At the moment, over 100 key leaders have taken up the challenge. In COSATU alone, many of its regional secretaries and the general secretaries of its affiliates have moved, not to mention some key negotiators and administrators who have taken up appointments in government. It is with this in mind that the ICFTU would welcome a clear and unequivocal commitment on the part of the ILO to support the trade union movement in South Africa. The plan of action that is contained in the resolution before the Conference gives explicit recognition to the needs of the trade union movement, as the country enters its transitional stage to full democracy. It is a plan which has been discussed by the Committee with the full participation of the tripartite delegation from South Africa. We are also pleased to note that the Committee clearly called on the ILO to ensure that all appropriate action is taken to bring about the implementation of this plan of action. The ICFTU and its affiliates are ready to continue giving every possible support and assistance to the democratic trade union movement in South Africa. Special attention will be given to trade union education at all levels, and to the trade union capacity-building, in cooperation with COSATU and NACTU.

The ICFTU is also pleased to note the intention expressed by the Government of the Republic of South Africa, to recommend the immediate ratification of the ILO Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, discrimination and against forced labour. We are very much encouraged by this move, and wish to express the hope that this will be followed by ratification of other key Conventions and a new look at labour legislation which has been an issue of contention in recent years. There is no doubt, however, that the legacy of apartheid will be with us for a long time, and it will require considerable resources to provide for basic needs and promote equality for all the people of South Africa. In this respect, therefore, urgent steps must be taken to start addressing the legacy of apartheid. It cannot be over-stressed that the success of the transitional process to full democracy will be largely dependent on what the new government is able to deliver to the vast majority of its people, long denied their rights under apartheid, certainly in terms of education, health, housing, employment and equality of opportunity. Thus, the wider international community must also be ready to respond positively and urgently to the needs of South Africa.

As this Conference is closing its chapter on apartheid, allow me to congratulate the people of South Africa, under Nelson Mandela's leadership, for their steadfast commitment in the face of an evil system of government, for their profound sacrifice. We rejoice with them at having reclaimed their right to be governed by the people of their choice and we rejoice that South Africa has now rejoined the international community as a free and democratic country.

The ICFTU would also like to pay tribute to the ILO for its outstanding contribution to the downfall of apartheid. The work of the ILO not only gave strength to those who were victims of apartheid, it also inspired those who struggled against apartheid throughout the world. The Reports of the Director-General, especially in more recent years, were not only informative, but also offered an insight into the apartheid system that was rarely equalled elsewhere, and clearly laid the basis for the development of policy in the fight against apartheid. It is, of course, impossible for me to single out the many people who played a major role in this struggle against apartheid. But in this exceptional situation, allow me to express my organization's profound thanks to Mr. Joe Morris and Ms. Shirley Carr, both Presidents of the Canadian Labour Congress and Chairpersons of the Workers' group, here at the ILO, who played a leading role in the struggle against apartheid. I would also like to thank Mr. Bill Brett, the current Chairperson of the Workers' group, whose profound commitment to the principles and values of free trade union movements has won him the respect and recognition of not only the South African workers, but also the workers all over the world. It has also been our good fortune to have had their leadership in the difficult period of the struggle; their keen interest in the affairs of South Africa profoundly enriched the workers' contribution to this struggle, and we are eternally grateful to them.

Finally, I must pay tribute to the many trade unionists across the world who took the struggle against apartheid as their struggle, and selflessly devoted their time, their energy and their resources; and also to the people of southern Africa who were victims of South Africa's destabilization policies. To them all, the international community owes a debt of gratitude for playing a leading role in the struggle against what was clearly one of the most hideous crimes against humanity.

Before ending my remarks, I would like to express the ICFTU's full support for the request of Mr. Bill Brett, Worker Vice-Chairman of the Committee, that the Report and the resolution be adopted unanimously by the Conference. Such a decision would assure the people of South Africa that the ILO is still with them as they embark on the reconstruction and development of their country.

Ms. HAK (Employers' adviser, Netherlands) – When Mr. Mandela – now President Mandela – was here in 1990, he asked us to walk the last mile together. We have done so, but before that the Committee on Action against Apartheid walked many miles, and it was not an easy road. We did have a common goal – the abolition of apartheid – but there were differences of opinion regarding how to achieve such a goal. Now here we are and we have a new member, South Africa, which when it came in, I regret to say did not get the treatment which I thought it would get, that is the red carpet treatment.

I would like to pay a tribute to many friends, and in particular to friends from South Africa. Here in this Office we frequently compliment each other, compliments have already been made this morning and more are to come as the sitting proceeds. I would like to pay tribute in the first instance to my South African trade union. They have operated here under very difficult circumstances and it has been a pleasure for us to know them; we hope to continue working with them in the future.

Of course we also have friends among the Employers' side. They have done a great deal in this country of which not many people here are aware and we have great admiration for them.

I would also like to pay a tribute to the International Labour Organization – we did not always agree, but we remained friends and I think that is the most important thing.

The ILO will not abandon South Africa, the resolution is concrete proof of that. You can still count on our assistance if you request it.

In the last two weeks many things have been said about the future of the ILO, about standard-setting and social clauses. But there is one thing that has not been mentioned at all during these past weeks, and that is the role that the ILO can and should play as a defender of human rights. That was the reason why we started the discussion on apartheid – to defend basic human rights. To me it is a great disappointment that hardly anyone, and certainly not the Organization, has taken any initiative or even mentioned what is happening at this moment in Africa in Rwanda and Somalia, and what is happening in Bosnia. So I appeal to the ILO to stop looking only inwards and to remember that it is an Organization which has and should continue to have a name as a defender of human rights.

Mr. NGCUCKANA (Workers' adviser, South Africa) – On behalf of the South African Workers' delegation, it is a pleasure for me to address the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference on the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Philadelphia Declaration.

This is an important session of the Conference this year for the ILO in that it is not only a celebration of 75 years of its existence but also an opportunity to celebrate the victory over apartheid. It is a Conference that the ILO can justly claim to be a victory because of its sterling contribution in the fight against apartheid. Allow me, on behalf of the South African workers, to pay tribute to the ILO for its unrelenting stand and fight against apartheid for a period spanning 30 years. It was in 1964 that South Africa was forced to leave the ILO by men and women who belonged to the constituent bodies of the ILO. The ILO adopted a Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and instructed the Director-General to produce a report on apartheid in South Africa that was discussed annually by the International Labour Conference. That decision in 1964 set in motion a massive international assault against apartheid across the continent, with ordinary men and women enlisting in the fight against apartheid. An international solidarity unparalleled in the history of mankind was born and ensured that the victims of apartheid had support. On behalf of those victims, as we stand here free from apartheid, we say we will remain eternally grateful to the ILO. To do that was not an easy task. Men and women remained true to the mandate of the ILO, stood and fought against powerful governments and representatives of multinationals. But they prevailed. And we knew that in the struggle against apartheid at home the world stood with us. The support that was generated by the ILO sustained those in exile, in prisons, at the barricades and in picket lines. A special tribute goes to the Workers' group and the various chairpersons who have ensured that the ILO Committee on Action against Apartheid tightened the screws against apartheid and provided technical assistance to the democratic trade union movement that was born in struggle, in particular COSATU and NACTU.

ILO standards served as inspiration in the struggle for workers' rights and the assistance given by the ILO to the democratic trade union movement ensured the growth of the movement that became the locomotive for change. A special tribute to the former Workers' Vice-Chairperson, Ms. Shirley Carr, who provided leadership and fought apartheid with passion. It is a pity that she is not here to share with us this moment of glory. We should also pay a special tribute to Mr. Brett, who ensured that the heat was not lifted until everybody was sure that they were free, to the international trade union movement that ensured that the ILO remained seized of developments in South Africa, to the front-line States who, even in poverty, made sacrifices that remain indelible in our memories and to the employers and governments of the world that kept the torch of freedom and democracy burning in the portals of the ILO. We will never be able to find words to say thank you to you all. The victory in South Africa is not only ours but yours. You made it possible for the first time in our history to have a tripartite delegation to participate at this Conference. This 81st Session of the Conference will end a chapter in partnership and struggle against apartheid and establish a partnership that will address the legacy of apartheid.

You have before you today the resolution to rescind the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and to dissolve the Committee on Action against Apartheid and to adopt a technical assistance programme to assist in the programme of construction and development announced by the State President, Comrade Nelson Mandela. That programme is a programme designed to address the legacy of apartheid and to bring about national conciliation, because there can never be conciliation with the glaring inequalities that permeate our society today.

The technical assistance programme that is contained in the resolution includes the following: technical assistance for labour legislation reforms; vocational training, which we believe will assist in providing skills to hundreds of thousands of youths who have spent much of their time on the barricades in the struggle for the demise of apartheid – it is important that they be helped to acquire skills to participate in the process of rebuilding the country; human resource development and management – this is to ensure a balanced approach in building human resources and management to bring those excluded by apartheid education into skilled jobs and management; affirmative action – this is a programme that permeates every aspect of South African social and economic life, to ensure that those disadvantaged by apartheid are brought into the mainstream of the social and economic life of our country; occupational health and safety – assistance to ensure that international standards are upheld and that workers can effectively participate in making safe and healthy working places; capacity-building – this will assist trade unions to participate effectively in the emerging tripartite structures in South Africa, an important task, with COSATU having contributed its capable leadership to government to assist in the process of rebuilding the country. The list is not exhaustive. This programme will also assist southern African workers with whom we are joined with SATUCC. The success of South African democracy is not only a South African responsibility, but the responsibility of all freedom-loving and justice-loving people of the world. Success will ensure that the economic development of the southern African region will be achieved faster than had been anticipated.

In conclusion, allow me, on behalf of the South African Workers' delegation, to pledge our commitment to the social clause in GATT and the World Trade Organization. There can never be balanced trade with countries that trample on human and trade union rights. If the ILO wishes to renew itself and to be effective in carrying out its mandate, the social clause is the route. The fight against apartheid linked human and trade union rights to trade, hence the sanctions. I would not be standing here speaking to you as a free man if sanctions had not been applied against South Africa. That is the basic reason that the South African Workers' delegation stand in full support behind the social clause. On behalf of the South African workers, I wish to pledge our solidarity with workers across the continents who live and work under inhuman conditions. We commit our trade union movement at home to meet its obligations in the fight for international human and trade union rights and we pledge our solidarity with them. We pledge to join you in the fight for a better life for all working people of the world.

Ms. WIKLUND (Government delegate, Sweden, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) – I have the honour to make this statement on behalf of the Governments of the five Nordic countries: Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden.

Against all odds, the process towards a truly democratic South Africa, initiated at the beginning of this decade, has continued. Our hopes for free and fair elections have come true.

Therefore, I have the tremendous pleasure, on behalf of the Nordic Governments, to express our satisfaction with the developments in South Africa and to welcome this beautiful country and all its people back into the international family.

But to express satisfaction is not enough. We are indeed also deeply impressed by the way in which the people of South Africa have managed to handle the process leading to democracy. With sanctions lifted, South Africa is now resuming its rightful place in the international community and in the United Nations – a move fully supported by the Nordic Governments. You can, all of you, see here the new colourful flag of South Africa, the second one on that side. Apartheid has finally been abolished.

The Nordic countries have for many years demonstrated their deeply felt detestation of the policy of apartheid. They have therefore strongly supported opposition to racial discrimination. They have all adhered to the international sanctions imposed on South Africa by the United Nations. Their relations with the South African Government of apartheid have been strained and limited.

But, all this is now history. The whole world rejoices at the new democratic South Africa and indeed at the election of its President, Nelson Mandela. Nelson Mandela now heads a government of national unity and reconciliation.

Its work of steering the country through the important transitional period has begun, but we all know it will not be an easy undertaking.

The laws of apartheid have been abolished for ever. But the wounds left as a legacy of this system will take a long time to heal. No doubt, the country has great economic potential, but this is a long-term problem.

The South African Government will face a tremendous challenge during the transitional period. The task of increasing confidence in the future and bringing decent living conditions for the many South Africans who lack basic facilities is enormous. It will take time to bring about all the improvements that are needed. Adequate housing will not be provided immediately. Unemployment will not disappear overnight. The means available will most likely not match the ambitions and almost certainly will not meet expectations.

Therefore, the international community and international organizations such as the ILO have a lot to contribute to the future development of the country, to the easing of tensions and to reducing the risk of violence.

Labour and social matters play a decisive role in the development of any democratic nation. In the view of the five Nordic Governments, the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa presented by the Committee on Action against Apartheid and worked out at its final meeting ever constitutes an excellent beginning for future ILO cooperation with the tripartite community of South Africa.

The resolution also gives the ILO a mandate to implement a plan of action, to work together with other agencies within the United Nations family and to take initiatives to coordinate broad areas of activities for the consolidation of democracy and the reconstruction of the country.

The Nordic Governments will continue to support South Africa's transformation to a peaceful and prosperous democracy.

Let me finally thank all the participants in the Committee on Action against Apartheid for their dedicated and constructive efforts, and express the hope of the Nordic Governments that we will continue to walk together.

Mr. BOUCAOURIS (Government delegate, Greece, speaking on behalf of the European Union) – A long-awaited event has at last occurred. Having, on 27 April this year, held free and democratic elections, South Africa can once again rejoin the community of nations both in the United Nations Organization and in all specialized agencies including the International Labour Organization, sharing with them the same values and principles on which a free society should rest.

Congratulations are due to the people of South Africa and to the new Government which embodies the legitimate aspirations of that people. On behalf of the European Union, I wish to welcome the tripartite delegation of South Africa to the Conference. The Government of Austria requests that I should make this statement also on its behalf.

A new era has begun for South Africa – an era which will be characterized by a democratic and non-racial society, where respect for human rights, respect for the rights of minorities, the rule of law, promotion of social justice and the elimination of all forms of discrimination will prevail.

Hard times lie ahead for the new Government. To enable it to achieve its goals, much help is required. The European Union shall play its full part to assist the new Government in its formidable task.

On 19 April, the European Union adopted a package of immediate measures to assist the new South Africa. These will focus on a dialogue centred on important sectors of cooperation such as trade, economic cooperation and development cooperation, in order to help address the immediate needs and aspirations of the South African people. These measures will be coupled with the beginning of a political dialogue to enhance and consolidate the democratic institutions upon which the new South African society will build its future.

Furthermore, the European Union, taking into account the decision of the United Nations Security Council of 25 May concerning the lifting of United Nations sanctions against South Africa, has decided to lift all remaining restrictive measures still in place against this country.

Of crucial importance for the future of the country will be the settlement of the issues of land ownership and employment. These are multifaceted problems where, on the latter at least, the ILO has an important and constructive part to play and can help considerably.

The ILO can usefully contribute to the process through its plan of action. The European Union encourages the Organization to make special efforts to assist the new South Africa within its areas of competence. South Africa needs all the assistance it can get to support the consolidation of democracy and reconstruction of the country.

The fact remains that a new page has now been turned in South Africa, and the challenges facing the Organization are of a different nature from those tackled so far in the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

It is time for the Organization to move on to a new phase of cooperation and involvement in South Africa. In short, we in the European Union feel that the Committee on Action against Apartheid has lived up to its expectations and accomplished its goals. Its task was extremely specific, for it was meant to combat a unique form of discrimination – bearing no resemblance whatsoever to other forms of discrimination – which it successfully did. It would be meaningless for it to outlive its use and raison d'être. This is the reason we are pleased to be in a position to request its immediate dissolution.

Mr. EDSTRÖM (Workers' delegate, Sweden) – The workers of Sweden, Finland, Norway, Denmark and Iceland want to salute and congratulate the people of South Africa for their victory over the most horrible political system in world history – apartheid.

We welcome both the readmission of South Africa at the ILO and the participation of the country's full, tripartite and multiracial delegation to this Conference. We are certain of the important future contribution that the country will make to the ILO in its work to promote social justice in the world. And, as from tomorrow, South Africa will rejoin the United Nations family. There are not really words enough to express our satisfaction at these events.

South Africa is now a free, democratic country for all its citizens, independent of race, creed or sex. But the legacy and consequences of apartheid are very severe and will remain so for many years to come. Therefore, it is essential for the ILO and its constituents to continue to assist the South African people to consolidate their democracy, and to give them technical assistance.

We fully agree with Mr. Mboweni, Minister of Labour of South Africa, that the final action of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid must be to put in motion a programme of technical assistance for the reconstruction and development of South African society.

And consequent to that, the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid must be dissolved and the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid, first adopted by the International Labour Conference in July 1964, be rescinded.

We see the resolution and its proposed programme of assistance as an important step to continue the commitment of the ILO and its constituents in the overcoming of the legacy of apartheid in this period of transition to full democracy that South Africa is now undergoing. We particularly want to emphasize the following areas: labour relations and collective bargaining; reform and restructuring of labour market institutions and labour administration; human resources development and management training; promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment; promotion of trade union and human rights; capacity building for workers' and employers' organizations; and employment creation.

We, the trade unions in the Nordic countries, will continue our very close cooperation with the trade unions in South Africa, and we are convinced that they have the capacity to meet the future challenges in the new democratic South Africa.

We will continue to assist our trade union brothers and sisters in their efforts to educate their members and to build up their trade union structures. We are also aware of the continued need for legal assistance. It is also important to stress the need for trade union unity, and we are particularly anxious to give support in the organizing of trade unions in the former homelands.

To conclude, we fully approve this last report of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid and the annexed resolution with its proposed programme of action and we expect it will be adopted by the Conference unanimously.

Mr. O'FARRELL (Workers' adviser, United States) – Upon reaching the successful conclusion of a struggle which continued over a period of more than 30 years, it is perhaps natural to want to review the struggle and highlight the role we have all played. As one of the initial members of the Committee, I will forego that desire and make a statement on behalf of the American Workers' delegation. However, for those who were dragged along every step of the way in this crusade, opposing the very idea that it was any of the ILO's business, it is not surprising that they might now want to take the least possible notice of the passing of the apartheid system and simply declare the work of the Committee they opposed over all those 30 years to be completed.

The Workers' delegation of the United States is proud of the role it has played over the years in this Committee and the equally important role played in cooperation with our trade union colleagues in supporting the development of a viable trade union movement inside South Africa, a movement able to speak for itself without proxies.

Many individuals, organizations, governments and even employers have participated in bringing about the end of apartheid and the dawn of a new day in South Africa. Arguably, the organizations that were on the cutting edge of the struggle and played the major role inside the country were the trade unions. It is gratifying for those of us who have been at this for a long time to see one of those veterans who carried on that struggle inside the country longer than most sitting on the South African bench. I am referring to Ms. Mashinini. It a great pleasure to see her here.

Many of us listened to the trade unionists inside South Africa and were guided in our actions by their advice on what we could do that would be most useful to them in ending the apartheid system. So today the workers of the United States intend to continue to be guided by our colleagues inside South Africa on the actions needed to assist them in their continuing struggle to overcome the effects of the system that so long oppressed them.

Those in this chamber who think that the end of this Committee marks the end of the need for the ILO to be concerned about South Africa, and that any future problems in South Africa should now simply be handled as routine matters of the Organization, fail to understand what has happened over the last 30 years, and indeed over more than the last three centuries, in South Africa, and are blind to the needs of the majority of the South African population. There is also, in our opinion, a lack of understanding of what the mandate of the ILO is.

In the final days of its existence, the Committee has produced a plan of action for the ILO that will hopefully meet some of the needs of the workers of South Africa in the coming years. It is significant that this document has been prepared with the full participation of a tripartite delegation from South Africa and reflects the need for a programme as seen by those most directly affected by that programme. This programme has the full support of the United States Workers' delegation and we are confident that it will be adopted unanimously by the Conference.

There are those who fear that the action we have undertaken over the years may have set a precedent for the ILO, but we do not believe this to be the case. This was a unique situation, one that demanded unique measures, and it is extremely unlikely that another such system of legalized discrimination will ever again arise. There is probably no such system or situation anywhere in the world that requires the ILO to take the type of action it has taken regarding South Africa. South Africa is on the threshold of a new and potentially wonderful world: universal suffrage, free and fair elections, a new and unspoiled government of national unity, ready to forgive the sins and right the wrongs of the past and face the future unafraid.

Let us wish them every success in their brave venture, but let us not forget that this is not the first time we have seen a nation set out on this path. Let us remember the experiences of others equally optimistic, equally brave, equally determined, who have as yet failed to reach their goals. Let us remember the past and learn from the experience of others lest we repeat their mistakes. Let us all here gathered pledge anew to provide what assistance we can to our colleagues as they set out upon this journey. A milestone on this road has been passed this year, but for South Africa and elsewhere, the fight for individual human rights, trade union rights, freedom and equality, the struggle continues.

The AFL-CIO and the American workers will continue to walk beside our trade union colleagues in South Africa in the future as we have in the past in the truest sense of international solidarity and friendship.

(Mr. Ould Sidi takes the Chair.)

Mr. SIBANDA (Workers' delegate, Zimbabwe) – On behalf of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, allow me first and foremost to congratulate Nelson Mandela on his election as President of democratic South Africa, and also to thank the Chairman of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid, Mr. Balopi, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of the Republic of Botswana, for having efficiently conducted the work of the Committee. I would like also to thank Mr. Jonzon, the Reporter of the Committee, for his work and especially for having been able to produce a text for the report that was acceptable to all parties on the Committee.

The ILO has carried out excellent work in the fight against apartheid. Its support for the struggle in South Africa gave hope to millions of people, not only in South Africa but throughout the world. Those of us whose countries share borders with South Africa know some of the activities the ILO carried out, because they were carried out in our own countries. We also remember the ILO's efforts to strengthen the front-line States in a period when the countries of southern Africa were victims of the aggression and destabilization policies of the South African regime. We also remember the ILO's work in the field of labour, which was largely responsible for the establishment of the Southern African Labour Commission. This body has now become a centre for our work on labour matters. It is, I am happy to say, organized on a tripartite basis.

In our work to fight the apartheid system, the ILO was an indispensable source of information, especially with regard to what was happening in South Africa, and also to what various bodies were doing to bring about the downfall of the apartheid system. The Director-General's annual Report on the situation in South Africa provided us with information that was not easily available elsewhere. But I must say, at least for those of us who had the opportunity to be here at recent sessions of the International Labour Conference, that the work of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid has been influential. Its conclusions and recommendations have been not only practical, but have been a call for action. In following the Committee's work, we saw the ILO in action and at its best. I wish to pay tribute to the work of the ILO in this field. In my own view, if apartheid is being buried today, it is in part due to the work of the ILO that has been undertaken here.

Now that South Africa has a democratically elected Government, it is important that the ILO take a lead in ensuring that the reconstruction policies of the new Government are fully supported. I am happy to say that the ILO's plan of action, which is well summarized in the resolution annexed to the Report, clearly spells out the needs of South Africa and those of the social partners. As everyone knows, the legacy of apartheid is going to be with us for many years to come. Therefore urgent steps must be taken to ensure that the basic needs of the people of South Africa, especially those who have been victims of apartheid, are met. I am talking here about education, health, housing and about all employment opportunities. The Government of national unity which has been installed in South Africa will largely be judged on whether it can deliver change or not.

The ILO has experience and it has expertise: it can make a direct contribution in the field of human resource development, especially in capacity-building in trade unions and employers' organizations. But the ILO should also be a major actor in influencing international opinion to support South Africa.

I would like to conclude my remarks by supporting the report of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid and the resolution annexed to it. I fully support the call by the spokesperson of the Workers' group on the Committee, Mr. Bill Brett, that the report be adopted unanimously.

Mr. ITOH (Workers' delegate, Japan) – I would like once again to congratulate the South African people and colleagues for having established a democratic Government with Mr. Nelson Mandela as its President, through non-racial, free and democratic election, and thus giving birth to a new South Africa, and put final end to apartheid. It has been above all the long and tenacious struggles of the South African people and workers who have brought the victory at this time. It has also been the international public opinion and cooperation built up by the United Nations and other international organizations, especially the ILO, which have contributed to the success. We heartily hope that the new South Africa will develop as a stable and genuine democratic country from now on.

Eight million Japanese workers who are together in our Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) have participated in anti-apartheid international activities through the ICFTU, to which RENGO is affiliated, and extended assistance to the trade unions and workers in South Africa.

We also have developed various anti-apartheid activities in Japan over many years. Since the African National Congress opened its office in Tokyo about 15 years ago, it has been RENGO and its affiliates which have consistently provided moral and material assistance to the office. With the new situation in South Africa, the ANC office in Tokyo has completed its task and was closed amid the blessing of the Japanese people concerned.

JTUC-RENGO, in response to a call by the ICFTU, sent five member observers to monitor the election in April in South Africa. Moreover, RENGO, with the thought that South Africa will need human resources commensurate with the new situation in South Africa, has started from this year a student scholarship programme for South Africa with the money contributed from our members.

I would like to express our overall support for the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and its annex, the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa. In order that South Africa can develop socially and economically as a stable and genuinely democratic country from now on, it is essential to provide international assistance and cooperation more than ever. This is what not only Mr. Mboweni, Minister of Labour of South Africa, but also all the members of the Committee emphasized in the deliberations of the Committee. I strongly support that the ILO strengthens its technical and other aspects of cooperation with South Africa, as emphasized in the resolution.

RENGO will also promote cooperation activities with South African friends directly as well as through the ICFTU. As a trade union organization in Japan, we will also urge the Government of Japan to strengthen its assistance and cooperation to South Africa.

This Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid which has played a central role in the ILO's anti-apartheid activities has completed its historical task and been rescinded. The Committee has completed its task amid a great victory. The victory has been won through the hard work and great efforts of many people of the Government and Employers' and Workers' groups who have been involved in the Committee. I would like to particularly express my deep and sincere esteem to Ms. Carr, and all other colleagues, who have devotedly and enthusiastically contributed to anti-apartheid activities from the Workers' side.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of New Zealand, I would advise support for endorsement of the Committee's report, and the adoption of the resolution proposed. In doing so, I would like to congratulate the Committee, and all of the members of the earlier committees, on the work contributed. In particular, I wish to recall the fact that the New Zealand trade union movement has participated regularly and consistently in the work of this Committee, and I acknowledge the contribution of the late Jim Knox from our country.

The events of the last year, which are outlined in this report, are momentous and form in themselves a testament to, on the one hand, the dynamics and speed of change. On the other, they are a unique example of the courage, creativity and humanism of a people in a movement whose objective was simply to win the right to dignity and respect for millions of working people, their families and their children. The events demonstrated positively what is possible.

As an organization, the ILO is entitled to share in the credit for what has been achieved, and in doing so we must not however accept that the job has been finally done. The government of national unity has been established. The leadership of Mr. Mandela is a graphic demonstration of the humility of a leadership won in struggle, that is committed to provide for the enrichment of peoples' lives by establishing and building processes for people and workers in particular to bring into being a uniquely democratic system that reflects the principles of the ILO itself.

South Africa has the potential and the capability to be a beacon for many countries. It can show that the process of democratic elections is not to win power for a particular elite, but to give leadership that breathes life into the words of the Declaration of Human Rights, the ILO's founding statement and the Declaration of Philadelphia.

As a Workers' representative, I share in the acclaim of what, to the peoples of South Africa, is rightfully theirs, but is yet to be won by so many in other parts of the world. The defeat of racism in South Africa is a defeat for racism everywhere.

The report of the Committee and the resolution proposed spell out clearly that the legacy of apartheid will be with us for a long time. It is important for the ILO to remain a central element in the organization and delivery, not only of its plan of action but also the technical assistance programmes that will be necessary to turn the vast tide of hope and goodwill into tangible improvements for the peoples of South Africa. It will be important that the ILO recognizes and accepts its ongoing role in monitoring progress, implementing its plan and reporting regularly to the Governing Body.

I not only accord the warmest congratulations to the new Government of South Africa, and send our best wishes for the future for the tasks ahead, but convey greetings and solidarity not only from the workers and the unions of New Zealand, but from all of the opposition political parties of our country that make up 49 per cent of the Parliament, from the New Zealand First Party, from the Alliance Party, and from the New Zealand Labour Party.

The New Zealand people demonstrated in practical ways their opposition to apartheid in many forms, and in doing so often had to fight against our own Government, on the issue of sports, and contacts in particular. In 1981, New Zealand, for some four months, took on the characteristics of a police State. At that time we fought to stop the Springbok rugby tour. In six weeks' time all New Zealand will join in welcoming the Springbok tour of this year.

I am sure the adoption of this report and its resolution, will gain universal support from all New Zealanders, including our Government. I can, with confidence, state that New Zealand will contribute positively to the implementation of the resolution before this meeting, which the New Zealand delegation hopes will be carried out unanimously.

Mr. PARROT (Workers' delegate, Canada) – On behalf of the Canadian Labour Congress and its 2.4 million members, on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of other workers represented by other trade union organizations in Canada, on behalf of the members of the Executive Council of the CLC, including the President, and the other officers, on behalf of our friend, a former president of the CLC, Shirley Carr, who from her home in Canada is no doubt following our proceedings today, and on my own behalf, I would like first to congratulate the men and women of South Africa for their courage, their tenacity and their creativity. These have been the subject of our admiration and this remains the case today. The example given by the people of South Africa is most encouraging for people all around the world who are looking for hope and for the belief that we can make changes in our societies.

To end apartheid was quite a challenge for the people of South Africa, but we know more challenges await them in the future in the transition to full democracy and in overcoming the effects of apartheid.

The report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid gives us the opportunity to make our humble contribution to assist the men and women of South Africa in meeting this new challenge. I will not today attempt to mention the names of people from South Africa, because I know I would omit too many. But I would like to wish all the best to all those who are part of the delegation today, and to all those who came to Canada in the course of the last 15 years or more to help us understand the struggle of the people of South Africa and to help us educate our membership so that they could support the struggle of the people of South Africa. I want to thank them all, and I want to say that we are very, very proud to be your friends.

Today, let us adopt the report unanimously, and long live the men and women of South Africa.

Original French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Chairman of the Employers' delegate, France) – As an Employers' delegate from France, but also as Chairman of the Employers' group, and also on my personal behalf, it is a great honour and joy for me to be able to thank the Committee on Action against Apartheid, and to congratulate it for having done an extraordinarily good job.

It has been a very long road; there were difficult moments; there was disagreement as regards the means but never on the purpose. But this year, amongst its members, the Committee had a Government representative, an employers' representative and a workers' representative from South Africa; and the very fact that they were present bears witness to the success of the Committee's work.

Consequently, I would like to thank all those who contributed to that success: the Chairperson of the Committee, Mr. Balopi, the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Brett – and through him, those who preceded him and particularly our colleague, Ms. Carr, who is certainly thinking of us today; and I would obviously like to thank all my Employer colleagues – first and foremost, our leader, Mr. Hernandez, Ms. Hak, and many others.

After many years, we now have before us a new South Africa and, as part of its tripartite machinery, an employers' organization – Business South Africa – a modern multiracial organization that includes all sectors of activity. We are very happy to see it here, playing its normal role as a delegation.

In this very hall, I was here when South Africa left the Organization; and I have always felt closely involved in this long process which has never been for me just another issue.

Consequently, I have a particular satisfaction in the way the situation has developed. I would like to assure all our friends in South Africa, the Government, employers and workers, of our total readiness as employers from all countries of the world to help them in their exhilarating task.

I would also like to express satisfaction with the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa which is annexed to the report, and which I am sure we will be adopting unanimously. This resolution invites the Governing Body to adapt the plan of action approved at its November 1993 Session to development needs in South Africa, with special attention to a number of points. I obviously cannot refer to them all, but the most important are: the promotion of trade union rights and human rights – upon which everything else hinges; capacity-building for employers' and workers' organizations and employment creation.

However, what we need to establish clearly is that – throughout this plan and during the follow-up of the plan – action should be linked to the needs expressed by the ILO constituents in South Africa themselves. I think this is very important. Indeed, all paragraphs in the resolution refer to this. I particularly welcome paragraph (e) which concerns the strengthening of independent, strong and non-racial employers' and workers' organizations, and paragraph (f), which provides that the tripartite constituents in South Africa should be given all the necessary support to assist them in the adoption of labour legislation and other measures which are compatible with international labour standards. It is therefore with great joy that I can associate myself with the Committee's conclusions.

Mr. LIEBENBERG (Employers' delegate, Republic of South Africa) – It is for me a particular honour, on behalf of South African employers, to address this plenary sitting in support of the Resolution of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Just over 31 years have passed since a South African employer last stood at this podium to address the International Labour Conference. This is an experience I have been yearning for for many years. It is an experience I will savour for the rest of my life. You will understand more clearly why this is, for me personally, such a momentous occasion if I tell you that, in the South African delegation that was compelled to leave the ILO in 1963, was my late father, J.H. Liebenberg. How happy and proud he would have been if he could have been here today to witness this proud moment, this event. Indeed, how moved he would have been if he could have experienced the warmth we South Africans have all experienced in these past hectic but happy two and a half weeks.

I speak not only for South African employers, but I think for all the South Africans who are participating in this Conference when I thank you, the international labour community, for the big-hearted, warm welcome which you have given all of us on our return to this magnificent Organization, after our long but self-inflicted and deserved absence.

As a country, as a nation, we have made mistakes that lesser people would not have forgiven. Yet you, individually and collectively, through organizations such as the ILO, have over the years reminded us sometimes gently, often vigorously, of the standards expected of a nation state in this modern world. And now that we appear to understand and have turned out of the dead-end alley we were in you have welcomed us back, and we say to you "Thank you – Thank you from the bottom of our hearts".

There are many individuals who have played a pivotal role in the long and difficult journey which has led to us once again occupying our seat in this plenary, too many to mention them all. But I cannot omit mentioning a few in the Employer ranks, such as Cornélie Hak and Tom Owuor, and Hans Hammar from the International Labour Office. Cornélie Hak must be thanked for her vision and her faith that South Africans in general, and South African employers in particular, would eventually get it right. Hans Hammar – to him we are indebted for his even-handedness. He never accepted or condoned the policies of my country. We knew where he stood but we also always knew that he was encouraging us to do things differently.

And then there is Tom Owuor, who played a decisive role in forcing South African employers out of the International Organization of Employers and our last remaining foothold in Geneva, but did so without malice and on the basis of deeply-held convictions – convictions and principles which made it possible for him to play a very important role in unifying South African employers into a new, non-racial national employer and business body, called Business South Africa. Tom Owuor personally officiated at the launch of Business South Africa a couple of months ago which was a momentous occasion. There have also been other moments that we have cherished over these past two and a half weeks, such as becoming full members again of the International Organization of Employers and of the Pan-African Employers' Confederation.

South Africa is an African country – it is a developing African country, experiencing to a greater or lesser extent the same growing pains as our sub-Saharan African brothers and sisters, and we sincerely hope that we will be able to share experiences with our African colleagues to our mutual benefit. There is much that we can learn from them, and I also think that there is a contribution that we can make in the sub-continent.

Our experience over the past years in dealing with problems in a tripartite and multi-party fashion may be of particular interest. In my country, we have not left it to the politicians and the Government alone to attempt to solve all the difficult problems. We and our trade union colleagues have concluded that even a popularly elected Government such as President Mandela's will not, on its own, succeed in making South Africa a winning nation. Over the last years bodies such as the National Manpower Commission, the National Economic Forum, the National Housing Forum, the National Education and Training Forum, the National Electrification Forum and many other national and regional fora have come into being. In these bodies the relevant stakeholders – almost always including government, labour and business – have been addressing the most pertinent policy issues and quite a number of important achievements have been made.

One cannot mention the tripartite and multi-party bodies in South Africa without paying special tribute to the South African trade union movement. We at the southern tip of Africa have one of the most robust and innovative union movements in the developing world. In fact, quite a number of the tripartite bodies came into being on the initiative of our trade unions. Over the last three or four years we have concluded that often more can be gained by bringing together all the main players and discussing issues rationally using bargaining power alone than through outright conflict leading to victory or defeat. We have had our major strikes and conflict and no doubt we will continue to experience the results of failed collective bargaining. But in a relatively short period of time the employer organizations and the South African labour movement have reached a surprising level of maturity.

This maturity manifested itself clearly, I think, at this Conference. The other Employer and Worker representatives who participated actively in the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid would readily agree that their task was made infinitely easier because of the ability of the South African Employer and Worker representatives to discuss issues quietly amongst themselves and actually help the Committee to reach its unanimous decision last Thursday. This ability to meet each other in quiet discussion is not a habit suddenly acquired here in Geneva. It is a healthy habit both sides have been working hard at over a period of time. It is a habit we will continue to nurture until, hopefully, it becomes a natural way of life for us in South Africa.

We should surely exercise this habit urgently now to reach internal consensus on the nature of the technical assistance we should be requesting from the ILO. In discussions we have already had with Mrs. Mary Chinery-Hesse and other senior ILO persons, we have stated that it is important that the South African social partners consult their grass-roots structures and then formulate our proposals in the National Manpower Commission, a tripartite body.

The re-entry of South Africa into the ILO and the decision of the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid to rescind the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid and to dissolve itself does not end the South African story. As far as we are concerned, this is just the beginning. Today is the first day of the rest of our lives.

Original French: Mr. DIOP (representative, World Federation of Trade Unions) – On behalf of the World Federation of Trade Unions, I have pleasure in congratulating the President on his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the Conference and in thanking the Director-General of the ILO for the particular attention he has consistently given to the situation in Africa over many years.

I would also like to take this opportunity of reiterating our congratulations to Mr. Mandela on his brilliant election to the highest post in the Republic of South Africa.

The World Federation of Trade Unions, which has been an active contributor to international solidarity, has been an eye-witness to history since it participated as an international observer in monitoring the elections held in April 1994.

In that capacity, we would like to bear witness to the part played by the South African trade union organizations, in particular COSATU and NACTU, whose leaders have displayed responsibility, lucidity, courage and vigilance so as not to react to the constant provocations directed against them throughout the course of the elections.

Without that self-restraint and that sense of responsibility displayed by our comrades in South Africa, it would have been impossible for such free, democratic and transparent elections to be organized in that country. So this is the appropriate place for us to pay them a tribute they fully merit.

The elections in South Africa, a country where there have been such fierce struggles – elections long awaited by the entire international community including the ILO – are now behind us.

A new period has opened up before us and we believe the ILO, just as it has done for the past 30 years in working for the elimination of apartheid, must now continue to be attentive and responsive to the essential concerns of the workers and people of South Africa.

Yes, the ILO and the international community still, and even more so today, have a responsibility and an obligation to continue working to ensure that the economic, political and social consequences of apartheid are eradicated once and for all, and to ensure that South Africa be equipped with strong and democratic institutions, without which it would be impossible to achieve social justice and lasting peace – the guarantors of stability in that country.

As you are undoubtedly aware, the brand new democracy of South Africa needs assistance in every way and in every area if it is to take root and flourish.

To that end, we fervently hope that our Organization's action programme will be updated and strengthened so as to adapt it to the new situation and the new needs which have arisen in South Africa – as has emerged from the Report under discussion.

Similarly, we consider that all assistance intended for the people and workers of South Africa and for the purposes of the country's reconstruction must be effected in cooperation with COSATU and NACTU, two democratic and responsible organizations which have already demonstrated their mettle in the consideration they have shown for the workers' and the people's concerns, and which have made a concrete and effective contribution to solving the country's many problems.

Thus in collaboration with the country's administrative authorities and with the other social partners, the reconstruction of South Africa can go forward in consensus and in perfect harmony in the interests of all the sons and daughters of that great country.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – On behalf of the Workers' delegation of Pakistan and myself, I feel it is a privilege to offer felicitations and express our sense of joy on this historic occasion. It is a Conference which celebrates the 75th anniversary of the forming of this great Organization, which believes that all human beings, irrespective of race, colour and creed, are equal and should have an equal opportunity to pursue their economic and social well-being without any discrimination, in an atmosphere of freedom and economic security. And we are happy at this 75th anniversary to welcome the Republic of South Africa. Their tripartite delegation is participating as an independent nation, as a full member of this great Organization. We welcome them and we salute them.

This Conference also establishes that the crimes that have been committed against mankind and the shameful system of apartheid have been eliminated by the heroic struggle of the people of South Africa and also the support of freedom-loving people in all parts of the world. We peoples of the world may be black or white but we belong to one family. We are born alike, and we will die alike, and we have to live alike, with love and affection instead of hate. And we therefore welcome the establishment of the new democracy in South Africa, a multi-racial society under the leadership of the great Nelson Mandela. We wish them success.

I have the honour and privilege to offer felicitations to the distinguished members of this Committee on Action against Apartheid, His Excellency the Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of Botswana who chaired it, Brother William Brett representing the Workers' group and Mr. Hernandez representing the Employers' group. We appreciate the work which they have done and the report which has been submitted.

I also take the opportunity to commend the work of Ms. Carr, our previous spokesperson in this Committee who has represented the Workers' group for many years for the cause of the freedom-loving people of South Africa.

On this occasion, we in the ILO are pleased with the resolution which has been adopted by the Committee and which should be carried out by the Director-General in his future activities in order to strengthen the new democracy and to eliminate the consequences of apartheid. This requires that technical cooperation should be extended to the new democratic regime of South Africa, and also to the social partners, the workers' and employers' organizations, to develop industrial relations to help to create more job opportunities in order to tackle unemployment, to alleviate poverty and to provide for human resources development in order to give each side the right to meaningful education and training.

With these remarks we hope that the Director-General and his good team will continue to extend all support, as they have been doing in the past, and we wish complete success to the people of South Africa in their new journey.

Original Chinese: Mr. FU (Workers' adviser, China) – At a time when the people of South Africa have achieved a tremendous victory of historic significance and far-reaching influence, we are now discussing with great excitement the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid to the Conference. This report is a very good one. It reviews the heroic struggle against apartheid by the people of South Africa as well as various activities of the ILO in support of their struggle.

More than one month ago the Chinese workers and trade unions sent a cable to the Congress of South African Trade Unions hailing, together with the peoples and workers of the entire world, the victory of the African National Congress, led by Mr. Mandela, in the first all-race general election in South Africa.

This victory marks the end of the last, most inhuman apartheid system in the world and the birth of a new South Africa of racial equality. It is therefore not only a great event in the political life of the people of both South Africa and Africa as a whole, but also a major event in the history of human civilization in this century.

We are pleased to note that the ILO has done much work in supporting the people of South Africa in their just struggle. The Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which was adopted in 1964 and revised on many occasions, including in 1981 and 1988, solemnly announces that the ILO: "strongly reaffirms its determination to pursue its action until respect for the freedom and the dignity of all human beings, irrespective of their race, is fully assured in South Africa", so as to attain the "total and final elimination of the policy of apartheid in South Africa". The ILO, based on this Declaration and supported by its constituents, has made positive contributions to the South African people's elimination of racial oppression and to the elimination of racism in civilized human society. Today we can proudly announce that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa has successfully fulfilled its historical mission.

Let us once again extend our warm congratulations to the people of South Africa, of African countries in general and particularly those of the front-line States and southern Africa, on the achievement of this historic victory. However, we should also be aware that the success of the first general election in South Africa does not mean the conclusion of the struggle of the people of South Africa. The ILO should, in accordance with the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa which is to be adopted at this session of the Conference, continue to provide the people and workers of South Africa with technical cooperation projects and technical advice so as to make active contributions to helping them overcome all difficulties and construct a new South Africa.

The Chinese trade unions and workers have always firmly supported the people of South Africa in their just struggle and will continue to do so, and we will support the country in all its efforts to build a new South Africa of racial equality, stability, democracy and prosperity. We are convinced that the victory belongs to the people of South Africa who have made great achievements in eliminating racism from their society.

Mr. MABUMO (Workers' delegate, Mozambique) – It is indeed an honour and great pleasure for me on behalf of the Workers' Organization of Mozambique (OTM) and as a former member of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for the last decade and a half to congratulate your election as the President of this historic international Conference.

Mozambican workers would also like to congratulate Mr. Balopi the Minister of Labour and Home Affairs of Botswana for his wise and dynamic leadership as the chairperson of this last ILO Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Mozambican workers also hail the front-line States for their dedication in the struggle against apartheid in South Africa. The concrete conclusions before this special session are undeniable proof of comrade Balopi's wise leadership.

For the Mozambican workers in particular and the population in general we are not merely welcoming a tripartite delegation from a new South Africa, it is indeed an inspiration of hope and satisfaction for the subregion to have at last a free, democratic and non-racial Government in South Africa.

The astounding joy expressed by most delegates of this session of the Conference means a lot for Mozambican workers, both inside South Africa and in Mozambique, because they contributed their skin, blood and bone to the bitter and arduous struggle waged by their sisters and brothers in South Africa in order to gain their legitimate, democratic and non-racial destiny which today we witness.

The report of the Committee before this sitting is the thermometer with which we can testify to and determine who is in favour or not in favour of the free democratic and non-racial new South Africa, as well as the peaceful and neighbourly coexistence among the countries in southern Africa. We urge that the report be adopted by acclamation.

The Minister of Labour of South Africa – Comrade Mboweni – clearly stated in the Committee on Action against Apartheid that the new Government of South Africa will no longer be a starting point for the destabilization of the region.

Mozambican workers and the population in general welcome this illustrative and guiding philosophy expressed by the Minister of Labour of South Africa because we know the meaning of the destabilization.

In conclusion, Mozambican workers look forward, as in the past, to continue without vacillation to work together with their sister trade union organizations COSATU and NACTU in this challenging period faced both by South Africa and Mozambique.

We shall march forward together in the struggle for the total elimination of legacies of apartheid and its consequences, both in South Africa, Angola, Namibia and Mozambique, COSATU, NACTU and OTM.

Mr. DATO' ANTHONY YEO (Government delegate, Malaysia) – The Committee on Action against Apartheid, in its report, reviewed the 1964 Declaration in the light of the historic progress towards a new constitutional order in South Africa. This significant development towards the establishment of a truly free, democratic and non-racial government has ushered in a new era for South Africa, requiring that the Committee should look beyond the post-apartheid era to see how the ILO can assist the South African Government in promoting social development in the country.

Even as the Committee was seized of the immediate task of reaching a decision on rescinding the Declaration, it had to acknowledge that the legacy of apartheid would take many years to eradicate, and that enormous resources would be required to promote equality and provide for the basic needs of all South Africans, as part of the national agenda to correct some of the social and economic imbalances in the country.

It is obvious that the international community has to address this situation, to be faithful to its declared commitment to promote social justice and to stay relevant to the daily struggle of the disadvantaged masses of South African society. The tripartite constituents in South Africa may be expected to appeal to the ILO to play its role in this context.

During its November 1993 session, the Governing Body also approved a plan of action for ILO assistance to South Africa in the transition to full democracy and in overcoming the ill effects of apartheid. Malaysia welcomes the ILO plan of action for assistance.

It is important that the members of the international community continue to support South Africa in its efforts to eliminate the consequences of apartheid. Needless to say, the ILO must be provided with the necessary resources to ensure that the implementation of the plan of action for technical assistance is adapted to the social reconstruction and the long-term development needs of post-apartheid South Africa.

Malaysia has provided some training assistance for the people of South Africa on a bilateral basis. We are prepared to contribute our assistance towards solving some of South Africa's social, economic and political problems, in view of our vast experience in social engineering policies to restructure society, with a view to bringing about balanced development and an equitable sharing of wealth in the country. We welcome the resolution prepared by the working group, of which Malaysia is one of the five government members. It is the product of long negotiations and reflects the consensus among the entire membership of the Committee. We trust that we will lay the foundation for the ILO to render effective assistance and to coordinate with other United Nations agencies in the planning and execution of programmes of socio-economic assistance to South Africa.

Mr. FREEMAN (Government delegate, United States) – The Government of the United States of America wishes to congratulate the people of South Africa on their hard fought and rightful transformation of South Africa into a free non-racial democracy. The recent election of Nelson Mandela as the President of South Africa and the creation of a Government of national unity represent an epic victory of popular will and the human spirit.

It underscores the enduring appeal and power of the democratic ideal and gives evidence that bitter division and conflict can be overcome in the effort to create a common destiny of peace and prosperity. The United States welcomes the readmission of South Africa to the ILO. We have noted with profound satisfaction South Africa's participation in the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference as a full and equal Member. I believe I speak for everyone who has met with or heard South Africa's Government, Workers' and Employers' representatives when I say that they have impressed all of us as exceptionally eloquent and constructive contributors to our work. Nowhere were they more eloquent or persuasive than in the Committee on Action against Apartheid. We look forward to having the support, wisdom and experience of the tripartite delegates from South Africa in the coming years, as we work in the ILO to promote workers' rights, human rights and democracy throughout the globe. As an observer and participant in the Committee on Action against Apartheid over the past decade, during which we on occasion have had some differences over tactics, I want to acknowledge clearly and emphatically here today that the Committee has made an important contribution to the struggle to end apartheid. I commend the Committee for its steadfast efforts through many years. All who have served on it and supported its work have ample and just reasons to be proud of its record. Today we have before us the final report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. I want to comment on two points relating to the Committee's work during the last two weeks. First, although the legal and political system of apartheid is dead, the legacy of apartheid remains a very serious problem for South Africa. South Africa's Minister of Labour, Mr. Mboweni, has made moving statements about this problem and what a daunting task the new Government has before it in moving South Africa towards social and economic justice. To do this, he pointed out, the new Government must make tangible and immediate progress in decreasing the enormous inequalities in opportunity and income, as well as in access to adequate housing, health care, education, basic services and so on. As the Committee correctly points out in the report before us, in dealing with these daunting problems, South Africa should have the full support and assistance of the ILO and the rest of the international community. Secondly, on a procedural note, my delegation would like to point out that this is an extraordinary occasion. The Committee on Action against Apartheid has recognized that its purpose has been served and, in a unanimous decision, it has recommended that it be dissolved. It is a rare occurrence for any United Nations body to take such an action by unanimous decision. We should note this today. We hope that more United Nations bodies will see the achievement of their objectives, as this Committee has, and will be able to follow its precedent.

Original Chinese: Mr. ZHANG (Government adviser, China) – The Committee on Action against Apartheid, after a careful analysis of the situation in South Africa following apartheid, has submitted to the Conference a relevant resolution. The Chinese delegation, which played its role, thanks the Chairman of the Committee and their colleagues for the excellent work they have done. The Chinese delegation, which played an active role in the work of the Committee, supports this document. The resolution requests that the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa, which was adopted by the ILO on 8 July 1964 and revised on 18 June 1981, 16 June 1988 and 20 June 1991, be immediately rescinded and the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid be immediately dissolved. The resolution proposes and asks the international community to continue its support for South Africa in its efforts totally to eliminate the heritage of apartheid. Following a very difficult struggle, the people of South Africa have finally conquered the apartheid system. The non-racial elections of last 26-28 April have opened a new era in South Africa, with the election of Mr. Mandela as President of the Republic of South Africa and the establishment of a Government of national unity. The birth of the new South Africa is of great historical importance for Africa and for all humanity, as well as for South Africa itself. It is the end of a long struggle carried out by the people of South Africa with international support. The dismantling of apartheid does not mean the disappearance of the negative effects of segregation. The eradication of the heritage of apartheid is for the people and Government of South Africa a very difficult task that cannot be accomplished overnight. Therefore South Africa will need assistance and support from the international community and the ILO. The Chinese delegation appreciates the efforts that have been made by the ILO over the many years in favour of the struggle of the South African people. We hope that in the reconstruction and development of the new South Africa the ILO will continue to strengthen its tripartite assistance and will provide effective and necessary support and assistance to meet the needs of economic and social development in South Africa. The people and Government of China have given their firm support to the people of South Africa in their just struggle against racism, and welcome the historic victory which was thus obtained. The Chinese people attach great importance to the strong friendship they developed with the South African people during their long struggle. China is ready and willing to develop friendly relations of cooperation with the new South Africa on the basis of the five principles of peaceful coexistence. We also intend to cooperate with South Africa in the area of labour relations in order to promote together the world of labour. We hope that the Government will strengthen its policies in order to promote a new multi-racial and democratic South Africa and eradicate the heritage of apartheid in order to contribute to peace and development in South Africa and the world.

Original Arabic: Mr. BADER (representative, International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions) – It is an honour and a pleasure for me to address you on behalf of the Secretary-General of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and on behalf of millions and millions of Arab workers in order to express our joy at the fall of the apartheid regime, and the victory of liberty and democracy. There is no longer white or black, everybody is equal again before the law. A thousand times no to racism! Arab workers and their unions have lived and suffered beside their brothers in South Africa. They have shared the hopes of the workers of South Africa throughout their years of struggle and Arab workers consider that the victory of the South Africans is a victory for all freedom fighters throughout the world.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the workers and trade unions of South Africa on their victory over a system that lasted for 350 years. We have witnessed the successful outcome of the struggle waged by the great fighter Mr. Nelson Mandela. Arab workers and the unions in our countries express their solidarity with the people and Government of the new South Africa and ask international trade unions and international organizations to give all kinds of moral and financial support to the unions and democratic organizations in the new South Africa.

I would also like to express my thanks to the ILO and its secretariat for all they have done to unmask the activities of the minority Government of South Africa, activities carried out against the interests of the black majority. The ILO revealed that there was a connection between certain international authorities, particularly financial authorities, and the minority Government of South Africa. The ILO allowed all of us for years to express our rejection of apartheid and our support for the legitimate fight of the people of South Africa and of all peoples fighting for dignity, freedom and independence on their own territory.

The struggle of the workers of South Africa, both within and outside the country, has been an example for all of us who are fighting for freedom. It is a struggle which has deserved our admiration, and all the peoples of the world, whatever their social origins, have taken up the fight against apartheid as their own cause. But today, in spite of the fall of the apartheid regime, we see that another racist regime still exists, and I refer to the Zionist, colonialist regime which is the equal of the apartheid regime. Palestinian Arabs are still suffering from racial discrimination. They are suffering from oppression in spite of the fact that they are the true native population of the country. Palestinians are the victims of all kinds of practices perpetrated by the Israeli occupation authorities, and human rights are still trampled underfoot in Palestine.

We are convinced that the trend since the Second World War has been towards the destruction of colonialism and we are sure that this trend will continue. I am convinced that the fall of the South African apartheid regime is the forerunner of the forthcoming fall of the regime of racial segregation in Palestine. There can never be peace in Palestine until the Palestinian people recover their national rights – the right to return, the right to self-determination and the right to a Palestinian State within its capital in Jerusalem.

Our President has always supported the fight of the people of South Africa. This battle has been won and today the rights of workers are recognized in South Africa. Workers there have set an example for other deprived peoples, such as the people of Palestine, Bosnia Herzegovina and Somalia, and all the immigrant workers who suffer from all sorts of racial discrimination and oppression.

The people of South Africa have shown that liberty has, in the final analysis, triumphed. The great Arab poet Abul Qassim al-Shabi was right when he said that if a people yearned for freedom, they had to take charge of their destiny; but the night always ended and their chains would eventually be broken.

Well, the destiny of the people of South Africa has finally been affirmed. Night has given way to day. The chains have been broken asunder and the apartheid regime has gone, never to return.

On behalf of millions of Arab workers, I would like to extend to Mr. Nelson Mandela our most sincere congratulations on the victory of his people under his leadership and on his election to the presidency of the new Republic of South Africa. I am quite sure that he will remain a staunch fighter, braving the storms and difficulties, and will leave his mark on the struggle of all peoples who love liberty.

I wish the people and workers of South Africa total success in this new phase.

Long live the struggle of freedom-loving people and of people fighting for their dignity and independence.

(The Conference adjourned at 1 p.m.)

Twenty-fifth sitting

Wednesday, 22 June 1994, 3 p.m.

President: Mr. Gray

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: DISCUSSION (concl.) AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We shall continue our discussion of the report of the Committee on Action against Apartheid.

Ms. KOLTHOFF (representative, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom) – As this is the first time the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom has taken the floor during the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, we wish to offer our congratulations on the two auspicious anniversaries being celebrated by the International Labour Organization this year – the 75th anniversary of its foundation and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

We also wish to welcome the tripartite delegation from South Africa, the first to attend the Conference since 1964 and the first to include members of a non-racial and democratically elected government.

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom is four years older than the ILO and is active in more than 40 countries. We have had a long tradition of anti-apartheid solidarity work and recently sent some of our members to observe the recent elections in South Africa. We are pleased to have the opportunity to discuss the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa and the proposed plan of action.

The recent elections in South Africa are only the first step towards true democracy and development in that country, and indeed in the region. Democracy depends on full and equal participation of all parts of the population in all areas of political, economic, social and cultural life. This means participation by all racial groups in South Africa, but it also means participation of women from all racial groups as well. A women's draft charter, endorsed by 92 South African women's groups, stressed that women face social, economic and ideological barriers to full and equal participation in the economy. Any ILO plan of action addressing the social and economic development needs of post-apartheid South Africa must not exclude the needs and concerns of women, paid and unpaid, workers.

The plan of action approved by the Governing Body at its 258th Session, (November 1993) included in the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa, contains many positive ideas for work at the governmental, employer and worker levels. However, we feel that the position of women could be more clearly emphasized. We also have the following suggestions regarding the areas singled out for special attention in the plan of action.

The topics of education and training, in particular vocational training and human resources development and management training, must emphasize the training of women in both the worker and employer and management sectors. In this report on the activities of the ILO, 1992-93, submitted to the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, the Director-General mentions that throughout the world and in all sectors of the workforce women generally do not have the same access to training opportunities as men. This reality should be kept in mind when formulating policies regarding the plan of action.

Consideration of the improvement of working and living conditions in the rural areas and for farm workers should take into account the fundamental problems of poor women in the rural and informal sectors as discussed in this same report. Women have even more limited access to productive resources and services, have a more precarious employment situation and lower productivity than their male counterparts. The focus on promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment is intended to relate to the equality of workers of different races but it must also apply to women.

The women's charter discusses the limitations placed on women's opportunities to participate in paid employment by their family responsibilities and proposes a reorganization of the workplace in terms of hours and times of work in order to accommodate them. Effective affirmative action based on gender as well as racial inequalities is necessary to ensure equal access to all jobs, training and promotion.

The Director-General's Report on ILO activities, names sexual harassment as an obstacle to equality of opportunity and treatment and this too must be addressed.

Pay equity and equal pay for work of equal value between the sexes must also be an integral part of any promotion of equality.

These are a few suggestions of how the needs of women can be integrated into specific areas of the plan of action, but the situation should be considered in all areas of the plan and in all areas of the work of the ILO.

Mr. Nkomo, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, said in his opening remarks to the Conference that the ILO's objectives can only be achieved in the context of actual developments in the real world. These words must be also kept in mind with regard to South Africa. Apartheid is gone, but racist and racial violence remain in South Africa and in the rest of the world. We must all work diligently against this as we did against apartheid because it is another factor which can divide workers from other workers.

Mr. Nkomo also mentioned the importance of understanding that seemingly unrelated issues like social justice, peace and stability can impinge on the realization of the ILO objectives. This, in fact, is the main prerequisite for democratization of a post-apartheid South Africa and indeed for the whole southern African region. The international community should take responsibility for assisting in this transformation and, as a non-governmental organization, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom will continue to support and learn from the people of South Africa in this important historic period.

We support the ILO plan for action, as well as the rest of the ILO machinery, which may strengthen this process of transformation; and we invite you to consider our suggestions to ensure that women are not excluded from these new developments.

Original French: Mr. MIRCEA (Government delegate, Romania) – First of all, I should like to offer most cordial congratulations to the President and also to the other officers of the Conference on their respective posts and on the way in which they are conducting the work of this session of the Conference.

As Government delegate of Romania, I should at once like to support the proposals, submitted by the Committee on Action against Apartheid, concerning the immediate abrogation of the 1964 Declaration on Action against South Africa and the instruction to the Director-General of the ILO to adapt the plan of action for technical advisory services and technical assistance to the social and economic development needs of South Africa.

Even if these proposals were to be expected, in the light of the process that has led to the establishment of democratic institutions of national unity in South Africa and the readmission of that country to the ILO, activities within the Committee are still of importance. As a member of this Committee, I should like to emphasize in particular the constructive spirit in which the work has been conducted, and the understanding that has been manifested by all three groups of the particular importance of the different proposals to be submitted to the Conference.

The Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Balopi, Minister of Labour and Home Affairs, Botswana has contributed considerably to this particular atmosphere as have the Vice-Chairman, Mr. Hernandez, Employer member from the Philippines, and the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Brett of the United Kingdom, and also the Reporter, Mr. Jonzon, Government member of Sweden.

All of them merit our thanks and congratulations. But I should also like to extend this to the members of the ILO secretariat who, with their documentation and pertinent analysis, have considerably facilitated the Committee's tasks.

Romania has given its support to the democratization process in South Africa on a bilateral basis. Economic and trade relations have been maintained, as have political contacts at high level, both before and after the election of Mr. Nelson Mandela to the presidency of the country and the establishment of a government of national unity.

As a member of the Governing Body within the ILO, Romania has made its contribution to the decision taken by the Governing Body in November 1993 to suspend the application of the Declaration on Apartheid and to carry out a plan of action for ILO assistance to South Africa in the transition to full democracy and in overcoming the effects of apartheid.

In the same spirit of solidarity and active cooperation, Romania will do all in its power, within the ILO Governing Body, to ensure the appropriate adaptation and application of the assistance programme for South Africa, taking into account the resolution submitted today by the Committee. It is our belief that this will cover a number of areas of action to bring about the consolidation of the democratic process in South Africa.

In conclusion, I should like to applaud the fact that South Africa is now returning to its activities in the Organization, and cordially welcome this country's delegation to this session of the Conference assuring our full cooperation and of the readiness of the competent Romanian authorities to associate themselves with the ILO programme of consultative and assistance activities for South Africa.

Mr. OWUOR (Employers' delegate, Kenya) – May I, on behalf of the Kenyan employers, add my voice to all those delegates that have called for the adoption of the Committee's report and draft conclusions. I would like also to take the opportunity to thank the Chairman of the Committee, his two Vice-Chairmen, and the Reporter on the excellent report.

The rescission of the Declaration by this Conference would be a cause for both celebration and reflection. It will be a cause for celebration because we will be able to share with the South Africans their joy in winning their hard-won freedom which has ushered in a new spirit of racial reconciliation in that beautiful land. But it is also a time for reflection in memory of those who had to pay the supreme sacrifice by watering their country's tree of freedom with their blood so that all South Africans can live in peace and racial harmony.

The work of this Committee has taken place in many venues, here at the Palais des Nations, in Zambia in 1981, Lusaka in 1984 and Harare in 1988. The impact of this updated Declaration arising from these meetings helps in mobilizing international public opinion against apartheid. I am pleased to be associated with the activities of this Committee almost since its inception. I take this opportunity to thank the South African Employers' delegate, Mr. Liebenberg, for the kind remarks made about me this morning. It was my great pleasure, first, to initiate the expulsion of South African employers from International Organization of Employers membership in 1983 in the cause of freedom, and then to spearhead their return, as a non-racial employers' body under the aegis Business South Africa in 1994, also in the cause of freedom. I also thank him and his colleagues for the warm and wonderful welcome which they extended to me on the occasion of my attendance at the inaugural meeting of Business South Africa on 15 April 1994. South African industry has played a pivotal role in the reconciliation process. Its representatives discretely intervened at critical moments during the negotiation process by hosting meetings between seemingly irreconcilable political forces. They succeeded in their endeavour.

I therefore advise the ILO to channel all its assistance programmes to employers in that country through the organs of Business South Africa, so as to strengthen the constitutional path of that body to enable it to play its role in nation-building. I share the call by the South African employers for ILO assistance to them to be demand-driven, and based on the identified needs of their membership.

Before concluding my remarks, may I thank the African employers for their active contribution to the fight for freedom in South Africa. I also wish to thank the International Organization of Employers for their clear understanding of the African employers' position on the apartheid question. May I particularly thank Mr. Hernandez, the Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, Mr. Da Silva, the previous Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group and other Employers' members of the Committee, particularly my thanks go to my colleague, Mr.Maenda of the United Republic of Tanzania, and the late Dr. Chanaiwa of Zimbabwe who played a major role in first initiating the dialogue between South African Employers and the rest of the African Employers.

I advise the Conference to adopt the Committee's report.

Mr. WOZNIEWSKI (Workers' adviser, Poland) – Allow me first of all to congratulate Mr. Charles Gray on his election to the presidency of the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference.

I would like to remind you that the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union "Solidarnosc" has been entirely supporting the struggle of our sisters and brothers in South Africa against apartheid.

We are happy to be able to express our satisfaction with the formation of a sovereign government of national unity following free and democratic elections, and readmission to membership of the ILO. We hope that currently and in the future the Congress of South African Trade Unions and the National Council of Trade Unions will not be faced with problems in connection with the promotion and protection of their trade union rights. We believe, as in previous years, that the South African workers and people will further strengthen their unity and overcome all hardships and obstacles on their way to the complete elimination of the apartheid system.

At such an historical moment, "Solidarnosc" would like to share with South Africans some of the experience it has gained in the course of transition from autocratic rule to democracy. The elimination of the totalitarian regime is not sufficient in itself to build up an indispensable infrastructure for democratic government, the rule of law and respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms. We are aware that the achievement of the unity of pro-democracy forces is easier during the struggle for democracy than afterwards, when the diversity of interests of different groups in society becomes more discernible.

Our conviction is that one of the very first tasks of the new Government should be the review and amendment of labour legislation, in order to bring it into line with international labour standards.

There are many impediments awaiting the young democracy. The most important that we have experienced is social and political impatience. All the social partners have many objectives to strive for, especially establishing their position in economic, labour and industrial relationships. This takes time. The Government should always remember that implementation of economic reforms without the direct or indirect support of the people is very seldom entirely successful. What should be emphasized is the need to avoid political, religious and racial intolerance. During the formation of a new public service in South Africa revenge should not be regarded as the guiding principle, particularly revenge against the white minority. Nevertheless, all persons who committed serious violations of human rights should not be treated with impunity.

"Solidarnosc" trade union subscribes to the conclusions of the Committee on Action against Apartheid and supports the adoption of the report, particularly the plan of action approved by the Governing Body of the ILO on the social and economic development needs of post-apartheid South Africa.

One of the great lessons of our struggle for democracy has been to use peaceful and non-violent measures. This guiding principle remains valid for the period after democratic elections since each new democracy is extremely fragile. To destroy democracy is much easier than to achieve it. Yet one more experience needs to be emphasized, namely, that democracy cannot be solely equated with the principles of majority rule. It is a well-known fact that there is no genuine democracy where a majority parliament eliminates its minority. Against this background, we advise the South African people, be they white, black or otherwise, to build their democracy along the lines of a national, interracial consensus approach. Only in this way will the young South African democracy be able to prove its fully fledged maturity to the entire international community.

During our struggle against Communism we have been guided by the principles of solidarity, we have borne in mind since the very beginning that the idea of solidarity extends not only to Polish people but also to each individual person on our planet, as well as to the next generation.

For all these reasons, let me recall a universal message contained in article 28 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to the effect that "Everyone is entitled to a social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can be fully realized".

Let this message be our joint programme for shaping democracy and social justice, domestically and internationally.

Finally, let me say that the South African Workers' delegation has actively contributed to the successful outcome of this session of the International Labour Conference.

Original Spanish: Mrs. AROSTEGUI MEDEROS (Government adviser, Cuba) – The Government of the Republic of Cuba welcomes the establishment of a sovereign government of national unity following the free and democratic elections conducted in South Africa, and takes this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Nelson Mandela on his unanimous election as President of South Africa.

This victory was principally the result of the laborious struggle conducted by the people of South Africa under the leadership of the ANC, with the support of all those who steadfastly condemned the infernal regime of racial segregation. Our people and Government always gave both political and military support to the struggle against apartheid. It is worth remembering that the fall of this regime was accelerated by the bloody battles in Cuito Cuanavale.

The time has come to pay special tribute to the role that was played in this process by the front-line countries for their praiseworthy solidarity with the South African people.

We should also not forget the hard work that was done by the ILO's Committee on Action against Apartheid, which is now concluding its mandate with honour.

Naturally, we realize that much remains to be done before all the effects of apartheid on the complex society of South Africa can be definitively eliminated. We therefore call on the ILO to develop programmes of action as quickly as possible to eliminate inequalities remaining in South Africa's labour structures.

For its part, Cuba will give its full support to the Government of national unity of President Mandela so that it can fulfil all its objectives and so that peace and social equity may prevail and poverty may be eliminated in South African society.

Original French: Mrs. FAUCHERE (representative, World Confederation of Labour) – On 8 June 1990, in this very hall, the International Labour Conference received Mr. Nelson Mandela the hero of the struggle against apartheid. Four years later South Africa was able to rejoin the ILO, and we have the pleasure of welcoming its accomplished representatives to this august assembly. There is no need to recall that, thanks to the will of the immense majority of the people of South Africa, under the leadership of Mr. Nelson Mandela, a system of segregation, and then of institutionalized apartheid after 1948 which caused so much suffering to more than 30 million people has been brought to an end.

Having elected Mr. Nelson Mandela to the Presidency, South Africa is inaugurating a new era of peace, stability, progress, social justice and national reconciliation. The appeal of the ANC inviting all sectors of society to work under the leadership of a government of national unity should support the will of the Government to take up the challenge of the political, social and economic development of the country for the good of all its citizens and with their voluntary participation.

The task before all concerned, at all levels of responsibility – government, employers and workers – is tremendous. Although apartheid has been legally abolished, its legacy remains present throughout society. In order to eradicate it, and in order to rebuild a new country, the cooperation of the entire international community is indispensable so as to back up the efforts of the various sectors of the national population.

The ILO can and should play a key ròle in the areas of its competence, that is: the promotion of equality among all people; the promotion of the rights of workers, both men and women; the strengthening of human rights including workers' participation at all levels of decision-making; the promotion of good industrial relations including bi– and tripartite negotiations; employment, universal access to education, vocational guidance and training systems; and universal enjoyment of social protection and health.

It is with this in mind that the World Confederation of Labour solemnly invites the democratically elected Government of the country to reinforce its action of social promotion through the ratification of the ILO's international Conventions. Furthermore, it would like to see all the assistance of the United Nations system redirected to help South Africa to attain this goal.

This is an occasion for the WCL to congratulate the workers of South Africa and their representative organizations most warmly for the magnificent conquest of their fundamental rights, which was achieved with dignity, serenity and determination while preserving the social and political peace of the country.

We would like to reiterate the expression of our solidarity in the pursuit of future social conquests. This means that we strongly hope that the report and the resolution which is before the Conference supporting the reconstruction and development programme of the country will be adopted.

Mr. FANNI ZADEH (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – It is a pleasure for me to speak on this memorable and historic occasion, as we celebrate with joy the long-awaited end to the apartheid system. I congratulate the people of South Africa and their leadership on their great victory.

Apartheid was not just a specific situation in a particular country. It was a disgrace to humanity as a whole, and its eradication was therefore a task shared by the whole international community.

During this long period much blood was spilt and many lives were lost. Yet it was devotion to justice and aspirations for quality amongst all races that kept the anti-apartheid movement alive and flourishing. Thus, and at last, justice has prevailed and humanity has been preserved.

The eradication of apartheid is without doubt or hesitation one of the most noble achievements of the second part of this century. For those who shared in this struggle, and for the heroic people of South Africa, it is just the beginning of a promising future.

A number of events contributed to the eventual triumph over apartheid. Yet there must remain no doubt today that the political pressure imposed on Pretoria was an effective means at the international level to force a radical change.

We are overwhelmed with joy at this triumph, as it is a victory for all of us. Yet we must not set aside the fact that the struggle was often hindered by the lax attitude of particular countries.

For a very long time, the international community was faced with stubborn resistance to the all-out pressure exerted against the apartheid regime. We shall never be able to tell how many lives could have been spared, how much more speedily apartheid would have been effectively dealt with had there been a solid commitment by those countries to side with the will of the international community.

We can only hope and pray, however, that the lesson has been learned – that the will of the people and the resolution to remove racism constitutes the inevitable eventuality and not the political interest of this or that country no matter how powerful they are. It is a lesson that could be of benefit for other disgraceful situations – Palestine and Bosnia.

The Committee on Action against Apartheid and the ILO as a whole have played their modest share in the struggle against apartheid. The ILO has consistently supported the cause and the rights of the South African workers in the context of its mandate. It has observed the situation ceaselessly and voiced its concern persistently.

The Islamic Republic of Iran has actively participated on the Committee on Action against Apartheid for the last several years. Action against apartheid has been a principle of our foreign policy. And we are now happy to support the resolution presented here by the Committee. It is time to assist the non-racial tripartite structures in South Africa and to render any assistance possible for the promotion of trade union rights.

I salute the brave South African people for the victory manifested in the first free elections which brought their desired representative and hero, Mr. Nelson Mandela, to the post of President.

I welcome the delegation of South Africa to the Conference. At long last South Africa is back amongst us, ready to play its deserved role as an important developing country in international affairs.

The Committee on Apartheid can now end its work with the seal of success.

Original Arabic: Mr. HAIDOUB (Government delegate, Sudan) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I should like to congratulate the President on his election to the chair of this Conference and to wish him every success in his stewardship so that the Conference achieves favourable results.

I am delighted that our review of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid with a view to rescinding it coincides with the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

It is not just a correspondence in terms of time but also in terms of the values of social justice enshrined in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization which correspond to the principles of equality that have triumphed in South Africa through the defeat of the apartheid regime.

As we discuss this matter on this historic occasion, we wish to make a number of observations.

The triumph of the values of right, social justice and equality calls for patience, perseverance and endurance in the face of adversity. And the patience and struggle of the people of South Africa under the leadership of the freedom fighter Nelson Mandela and his comrades is certainly a fine example of the triumph of such values.

The solidarity of peoples, organizations and institutions in proclaiming the values of right and social justice must eventually bear fruit, however long it takes. And surely the solidarity of the freedom-loving and peace-loving peoples who have aligned themselves with right standards is cogent proof of this fact.

As we discuss this report today, we have every right to feel proud of the endeavours of the ILO and its tripartite constituents, of their active solidarity in adopting the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in 1964 and later in resolutely following up the matter through their discussions of the reports of the Director-General and the Conference Committee on Action against Apartheid.

With the dawn of an era of freedom in South Africa and the election of a democratic Government representing the entire population of South Africa, we must congratulate the people of that country on their historic and outstanding achievement and welcome their tripartite delegation, which has resumed its rightful status and has played an effective part in the proceedings of this session of the Conference.

The Governing Body of the ILO, having evaluated the substantial progress that has been made in furthering the triumph of civilized values, suspended the Declaration by a decision adopted at its 258th session in November 1993 and adopted a plan of action for assistance to South Africa in overcoming the effects of apartheid. The Governing Body is to be commended on its action. At its historic meeting, the Committee on Action against Apartheid considered the approach taken by the Governing Body and adopted a decision rescinding the Declaration and endorsing the plan of action to assist the people and the social partners in South Africa.

The delegation of the Government of Sudan, having studied the report of the Committee, warmly thanks it for its evaluation of the situation following the triumph of the people of South Africa and the election of a democratic Government and supports the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa submitted by the Committee. It is also in favour of endorsing the plan of action adopted by the Governing Body with a view to eliminating the adverse effects of apartheid and meeting the basic needs of the people of South Africa.

We in Sudan feel that our support for the struggle of the people of South Africa is a form of duty to ensure that the values of right and social justice ultimately triumph. We aspire to friendly and productive relations with the people and Government of South Africa and we believe that a free South Africa will contribute to the promotion of development efforts, not only on behalf of the people of South Africa but on behalf of all the peoples of Africa, since it is a country with material, natural and technical resources in addition to its long experience of combat.

We shall move forward, God willing, along the path shown to us by the great leader Mandela towards the increased normalization and the strengthening of democracy.

In conclusion, we wish to say that we support the resolution submitted by the Committee to the Conference and that we hope that it will be adopted unanimously.

May the peace of God and His mercy and blessings be upon you.

Original Russian: Mr. BORSHCHEVSKY (Government delegate, Russian Federation) – The Russian Federation supports and fully endorses the contents of the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa.

My country, over a period of many years, has consistently and with great energy contributed to the fight against apartheid. Today, from this rostrum, we would like to congratulate the people of the Republic of South Africa, President Nelson Mandela and the Government of national unity on their historic victory. We welcome the return of a democratic South Africa into the family of the United Nations.

A new and difficult phase is now beginning in the life of the people of South Africa. Difficult work lies ahead to eradicate fully the vestiges of the shameful practices of humiliation and inequality that were part of apartheid. It is necessary to make use of all possible channels to build a new South Africa and solve these problems. An important role in this process can and must be played by international organizations, including the International Labour Organization.

That is the very idea which lies at the heart of the resolution under consideration. The plan of action referred to in paragraph 2 of the resolution determines a very large area of action for the International Labour Organization, together with the Government and employers' and workers' organizations in South Africa.

Russia, for its part, is already actively participating by developing mutually beneficial cooperation with South Africa in order to help this country solve the serious problems that now lie before it.

The possibilities and potential that the Russian Federation and South Africa have are in many respects complementary, and this creates an environment conducive to such cooperation.

In conclusion, we would like to pay tribute to the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and also to the Committee on Action against Apartheid. They have fulfilled their important role, but they should not yet fully be written into the history books. They can serve as a beacon to direct us as we attempt to solve other complex tasks and problems that we are confronted with in the present-day world.

Original Arabic: Mr. ISSA (Workers' delegate, Syrian Arab Republic) – I have pleasure in participating in this sitting so as to pay tribute to the people of South Africa. For many years in the Committee on Action against Apartheid, we have been witnesses of the suffering of these people, and this is a happy occasion because, as a result of this great victory, we have put an end to a very difficult period of their existence.

This victory has, in fact, put an end to the spectre of the worst kind of colonialization, namely the apartheid regime. For the Arabs, this great victory achieved by the workers and the people of South Africa is a factor which encourages us to continue our struggle to recover our occupied territories and to recover our rights. Finally, this victory will, of course, drive us forward even harder to attain our objectives and bring closer the date to which we are all looking forward.

The struggle of the workers and the people of South Africa has for many years received our support, and we have always shown solidarity with those involved in the struggle. We wanted to see South Africa attain all of its objectives fully through this struggle against the apartheid system.

We have also observed the positive trend in political life in South Africa, in particular thanks to the dialogue and negotiation between the national liberation movement presided by the great Nelson Mandela and the white minority led by Mr. De Klerk.

Today, following the end of the struggle which led to the victory of the people of South Africa, we pay tribute to the victory achieved by these people. We would like to reaffirm our attachment to solidarity, cooperation and the struggle against the worst form of colonization in our times, which has brought us closer to the people of South Africa. We are happy to see any victory for democracy and freedom achieved by the people of South Africa in their legitimate struggle. That is why we feel that what has happened in South Africa is a victory for us as well.

In the Syrian Arab Republic we are fighting for legitimate humanitarian objectives, which are supported by all international standards, through the international institutions, in particular the United Nations. On various occasions and in various bodies, we have reaffirmed our attachment to the right of the Arab people to liberate their occupied territories. This is a very important principle on which we base the continuation of the struggle pursued by President Assad in an attempt to find a global solution to the struggle between the Arabs and the Zionists on the basis of a total and unconditional withdrawal of Israeli forces from all occupied territories, including the Golan, southern Lebanon, the West Bank and Gaza, in accordance with Security Council resolutions 142, 143, 138 and 425.

On behalf of the workers and trade unionists of Syria and the trade union movement in Syria, I would like to express our warmest and most sincere congratulations to the workers of South Africa who have always pursued their struggle and to their trade unions, NACTU and COSATU. I would also like to express our satisfaction that, with the election of Mr. Nelson Mandela to the presidency of South Africa, they have recovered their rights. This is a great victory and, from this rostrum, I would like to express our confidence that relations of mutual cooperation and friendship will further develop between us. We are ready to make greater efforts to strengthen this cooperation and to render service to our common objectives and our cause.

Among the important milestones that have marked the life of this Organization, there is one important event and that is the return of South Africa to the United Nations family. The people of that country can now participate in the adoption of international labour standards and their reinforcement.

And I would like to pay tribute here to the efforts of the International Labour Organization in giving the workers in South Africa its full support against the apartheid regime. The ILO will, of course, provide increased assistance and establish a reconstruction cooperation programme with South Africa so as to eliminate the consequences of apartheid.

Having taken part in the work of the Committee on Action against Apartheid for many years, I would like to pay tribute to the efforts made by our colleagues in the Committee in the struggle against the policy of apartheid and inhuman practices. I would like to congratulate all those who participated in putting an end to this regime. We pay tribute to the workers and people of South Africa, and to the South African martyrs who have paid with their lives for this victory which we welcome most warmly.

In conclusion, I would like to pay tribute to all of you. We are confident that, one day, we will be able to celebrate the victory of our Arab nation as we are celebrating today the victory of the people and workers of South Africa.

Long live workers' solidarity between peoples of the world and between Syria and South Africa and their trade unions! Long live people struggling for justice, development and freedom!

Original Farsi: Mr. GHEITASI (Workers' adviser, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I am happy to be able to address this august assembly on the occasion of the end of apartheid in South Africa. After more than 30 years since the last representative of South Africa left this assembly in 1963, we are pleased to welcome this country into our midst once again. As a former member of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, I would like to say that the workers of the Islamic Republic of Iran congratulate this Committee and its Chairperson who was able skilfully to guide the work of the Committee. We would like to address our congratulations to the workers of South Africa on their victory against apartheid. This is proof of the serious work which was done in the Committee on Action against Apartheid. I would like to refer to paragraphs (e) and (f) of the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa.

We continue to be witness to various forms of apartheid throughout the world. We still have in some parts of the world apartheid between whites and blacks; we have Zionism; we have fascism; we have segregation problems that take various forms and we hope that we can eliminate them all.

In conclusion, I would once again like to reiterate my congratulations to the people of South Africa and Mr. Nelson Mandela on his election. We consider his victory as our victory and we would like to appeal to the international community and the international trade union movement to support the trade unions in South Africa. I would like to thank once again all those who have taken part in the struggle against apartheid. Today we see a new South Africa. We see a new democratic system and we in the Islamic Republic of Iran would like to confirm our support for the workers and people of the new South Africa.

Mr. VAN HEERDEN (Government adviser, Republic of South Africa) – My task today is very simple. I have three things that I want to say. The first is to say thank you; the second is to make a request; and the third is to make a commitment.

Saying thank you is undoubtedly the hardest thing to do, partly because it is impossible to list all the people to whom thanks are due, and partly because it would be impossible to convey the depth of our gratitude to the ILO and the people who make it up. It is necessary for me to name some people in particular, but it is by no means all the people to whom we want to convey our thanks; but certainly we must mention the Officers of the Committee on Action against Apartheid, the excellent Chairperson, Mr. Balopi from Botswana, our Reporter, Mr. Jonzon from Sweden, the Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons and members of the Workers' and Employers' benches. Earlier, tribute was paid to Ms. Hak from the Netherlands, who served for many many years on that Committee and is a dear friend of ours, and to Ms. Carr who is not here this year, but who has also made an invaluable contribution to our work. I would like to add to that list the members of the secretariats of the Workers' and Employers' groups, who make a contribution that is not often officially recognized, but which has been absolutely vital to the success of that Committee; and I would like to mention as well the staff of the Equality and Human Rights Coordination Branch, which, under the direction of Mr. Maier and Ms. Chinery-Hesse, have made a very consistent contribution to the process of change in South Africa. I know that I have certainly left out people and I want to convey to all of the delegates, to the Organization as a whole, our sincere thanks.

This session of the Conference is marked by many significant dates – the 75th anniversary of the ILO and the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of Philadelphia. It is also the 30th occasion on which the Conference has considered the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and the Special Report of the Director-General on the same subject. These three events, these three significant dates, deserve to be celebrated together, not just because of their historical symmetry, but because the end of apartheid in South Africa is a victory for all those who share the vision of those who founded the ILO in 1919. The principles embodied in the Constitution of the ILO and the Declaration of Philadelphia are the same as those that guided the course of democracy in South Africa, and those principles will continue to inform the Government of national unity.

The consistency shown by the ILO in 30 years of unrelenting concern with the issue of apartheid is nothing short of remarkable. The 30 Special Reports of the Director-General provide not only an educative panorama of the rise and the fall of apartheid, but testify to the rigour with which the ILO can and should pursue its principles. The ILO's stand on apartheid should become the benchmark of its promotional activities. The supportive role played by the technical cooperation activities implemented in terms of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid succeeded in promoting principles and concepts, such as tripartism, which proved invaluable in the democratization of South African industrial relations, and then of South African politics as well. Countless ILO seminars, study tours and training programmes built capacity in the liberation movements, the trade unions and the employers' organizations – capacity on which the future of South Africa now rests.

My delegation believes that the most appropriate and effective way to reciprocate for the 30 years of solidarity shown by the ILO is to affirm the principles of the Organization in the construction of a new society in South Africa and to provide a working model of tripartism and social justice of which the ILO can be proud. In addition, we commit ourselves to assuming the full responsibilities of membership. South Africa was a founding member of the ILO and we look forward to renewing our contribution to the development of this vital agency of the United Nations system as it faces up to the challenges of a world that is changing with unprecedented speed.

South Africa, too, faces its challenges. Challenges that are not unique to South or southern Africa, but are increasingly global – challenges such as unemployment, particularly amongst young people and women, rural development, job creation, appropriate training and retraining, discrimination. These are the criteria by which democracy in South Africa will be judged. South Africans want more than just the vote, essential as that may be. They want their fair share of South Africa's resources – housing, education and training, productive employment. They want an end to 300 years of systematic exclusion. In short, they want social justice.

To measure up to the challenges facing the Government of national unity and the social partners in South Africa, we will need a massive mobilization of both domestic and international resources and we look to the ILO to play a key role in this offensive. The resolution before you in the report of the Committee shows an appreciation of the fact that the struggle for social justice in South Africa has only just begun and demonstrates the resolve of the ILO to help address the deep legacies of apartheid.

If we succeed in providing a decent measure of social justice to the majority of South Africans, we will have rewarded not only the South Africans who struggled for it, but we will have also rewarded the international community for its moral and material support throughout that struggle. South Africa may become a case-study on how to address many of the critical issues that now fall within the core mandate of the ILO and we hope that our experience will enable others to make progress in tackling the problems of inequality and exclusion.

Frankly when we survey the world situation at the close of the century, we are forced to acknowledge that the state of society is perhaps no better than it was when the ILO was formed in 1919. Social, economic and political institutions are cracking and we are forced to re-examine their foundations to ascertain whether they can withstand the increasingly frequent and violent tremors which shake them. In South Africa we are in the process of thoroughly reviewing our socio-economic system, trying to assess what is valid and what is not and laying a new base for the future. In that process we want to learn from the experience of others and simultaneously to share with them what we are learning. What better international forum for such a dialogue and partnership than the ILO?

In this respect, we fully support the efforts of the Director-General to make the ILO a more lively and critical forum for debate. The Organization forged many of the policies that are central to the reconstruction and development programme that has now been launched in South Africa. And we look to the ILO to continue to provide intellectual leadership on the rather perplexing problems that global change has brought in its wake.

Of special significance to South Africans, and we believe to many other parts of the world, is the question of equality, real equality. We have dismantled the system of apartheid, but we have only just begun the process of establishing equality in South Africa. We have made a solid start by acknowledging that equality is more than the mere abolition of unjust laws, and more than simple legislation. We will have to change, as individuals and as institutions, and change again and again, if we are to provide an apposite form of equality in practice. That is the target we are committed to in South Africa, as tripartite social partners, and it is a commitment that we will not neglect. In fact this shared tripartite commitment to democracy and social justice probably provides the main prospect for success in South Africa. Reconstruction, development, progress, these are only words without the very concrete commitment from the social partners.

I believe that we will succeed in establishing equity in South Africa, and my confidence is based not on a simple leap of faith. It is not simple rhetoric. It is based on what I have seen inside my fellow South Africans – that is a determination and a resilience that defies description. We stood by our principles in the face of terrible repression, and we will stand by our principles – your principles – in the face of terrible challenges as well. Stand by us, and we will stand by you.

The PRESIDENT – With one "small" exception there are no more speakers on my list. The delegates to the Conference have just completed a thorough discussion on this important question. The adoption of the report entails not only the adoption of the summary of the Committee's discussions, paragraphs 1 to 29, but also the resolution submitted by the Committee to the Conference.

May I take it that paragraphs 1 to 29 of the report are adopted?

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 29.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING POST-APARTHEID SOUTH AFRICA, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON ACTION AGAINST APARTHEID: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa was unanimously adopted by the Committee. If there are no objections I shall take it that the resolution is unanimously adopted by the Conference.

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – During the past couple of weeks I have made every effort to exercise my prerogatives judiciously. Now, however, I would like to use them, as President of this Conference, to express my deepest satisfaction at the adoption of the resolution concerning post-apartheid South Africa and at the historical developments in that great country which have, in the view of this Conference, rendered the Committee on Action against Apartheid obsolete – one of the few United Nations committees ever rendered obsolete, I might add.

In a time when new forms of apartheid are rearing their ugly heads throughout the world, your steadfast determination to fight discrimination and social exclusion should be an inspiration to us all. Of course, the struggle against social exclusion is far from over. As stated in the resolution which has just been passed, the legacy of apartheid will take many years to eradicate. However, the first all-important steps have been taken, and I assure you that the ILO will continue as your partner during the long journey that lies ahead.

I would particularly like to commend the South African employers and workers for the key role they have played alongside the Government in achieving not only political agreements, but also in building the socio-economic foundation necessary for social justice and peace. Two weeks ago, we heard Mr. Mboweni, the Minister of Labour of South Africa, tell us that "the ILO principles of tripartism, social partnership and social justice are our compass". We also heard him tell us that South Africa's reconstruction and development programme derives its legitimacy from the support it commands amongst the major stakeholders in South African society.

In this regard, I would like to cite just two concrete examples showing that South Africa's social partners are serious about creating jobs, and demonstrating to us all what tripartism can do in the fight against poverty and social exclusion. The first example concerns the framework agreement promoting the use of labour-intensive methods in the South African construction industry. This agreement was negotiated directly between worker and employer representatives, and it paves the way for increasing the impact of infrastructure investment programmes on sustainable employment. The second example concerns the manner in which South Africans have used tripartite collaboration, involving – together with workers and employers – a broad cross-section of civil society, to arrive at a consensus in the formulation of a national public works programme which will focus on productive employment cooperation and creation.

In both cases, employers and workers have understood that their own sectoral interests are intimately linked to the future of South Africa as a whole. The employers have understood that they share a responsibility in creating not just profits, but also jobs – and that this is in their own best interest to ensure a stable business climate in South Africa. The workers within this country's formal sector have understood that they will not be able to protect their hard-won rights without looking beyond the circle of their immediate membership to the problems of unemployment and social exclusion in society as a whole.

Once again, in the name of all the delegates to this historic 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, let me congratulate the Committee on Action against Apartheid for their excellent report, and let me thank the South African tripartite delegation for contributing to the success of this Conference. With South Africa as a Member and as a partner in development, the ILO is now a richer and wiser organization. We look forward to working together with South Africa to bring the just-adopted resolution to reality. But we also look forward to learning from South Africa's experiences to help us confront together the challenges that lie ahead.

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the report of the Resolutions Committee, which is found in Provisional Record No. 19.

It is my pleasure to invite the Officers of the Committee to come up to the rostrum: the Chairman and Reporter, Mr. Gopalan, Government delegate, India; the Employer Vice-Chairman, Mr. Castle, Employers' Adviser, United Kingdom; and the Worker Vice-Chairman, Mr. Tapiola, Workers' delegate, Finland.

Mr. GOPALAN (Government delegate, India; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee) – I have great pleasure in presenting the report of the Resolutions Committee. Ten resolutions have been submitted on the occasion of the present session of the International Labour Conference in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders. The text of these resolutions are reproduced in Provisional Record No. 1.

The Resolutions Committee was set up by the Conference to deal with these resolutions, which were introduced by their authors. There were two mergers presented by the Workers' delegates: one of the resolutions concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and another concerning the World Summit for Social Development.

The Committee had then before it eight resolutions to determine, through a vote, the order of priorities of the first five. Since among the eight remaining resolutions there were still three that concerned the 75th anniversary of the ILO, one from each of the three groups, the Employers' and Workers' groups in the Committee decided to withdraw theirs. The Committee had finally only six resolutions to vote on in order to determine the order of priority.

As indicated in paragraph 9 of the Resolutions Committee's report, the first five resolutions have been classified as follows: (i) the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation; (ii) the World Summit for Social Development; (iii) the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour; (iv) a resolution calling upon the ILO to resist the introduction of a social clause in international trade and to review ILO standards; and (v) the need to harmonize and improve ILO informatics systems for optimal utilization and accessibility by all States. With only six resolutions, there was no need for the Committee to set up a working party to make recommendations as to the ordering of the remaining resolutions.

Following a general debate and the consideration of 41 amendments, the Committee adopted by consensus a text of a resolution entitled "Resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation".

Having reaffirmed the fundamental principles and values of the ILO, this resolution calls upon member States and employers' and workers' organizations to join efforts to renew the means of action of the ILO so that its constituents can enjoy improved benefits from it, in the light of the changes in the world today. In this connection, the resolution recognizes the different stages of development of countries and the need to keep paragraph 3 of article 19 of the ILO Constitution in mind.

The resolution also requests the Director-General to present his views to the Governing Body of the ILO as to how to follow up to the ideas expressed during the debate on his Report to the present session of the International Labour Conference, and calls upon the Governing Body to duly inform the Conference.

A second resolution titled "Resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development" was also adopted by the Committee, after a general discussion and the examination of 55 amendments.

The main thrust of this resolution is to promote the appropriate involvement of workers' and employers' organizations in the preparation for, conduct of and follow-up to the World Social Summit. Due consideration should be given to the competence, mandate and work of the ILO. The resolution also invites the Governing Body to instruct the Director-General to give the full support needed, before and after the World Summit, as described in the text of the resolution, bearing in mind the problems of developing countries, particularly the least developed countries and the countries in transition.

Although the Committee had a brief general discussion on the third resolution entitled "Resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour", on account of the limited time available it could not be taken up for detailed consideration. However, during the general discussion, differing views were expressed regarding the strategies for the elimination of child labour.

The work of the Resolutions Committee was carried out smoothly and all decisions were taken by consensus, thanks to the spirit of cooperation of the members of the Committee from all three groups. I would, in this context, place on record my deep appreciation of the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Kari Tapiola of the Workers' group, and Mr. Charles Castle of the Employers' group. My special appreciation and thanks are also due to Mr. von Muralt and his dedicated team in the secretariat of the Resolutions Committee.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open.

Mr. CASTLE (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom; Employer Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – I am both personally and formally pleased to be called to this rostrum by such a distinguished graduate of, among other institutions, the old university of the Resolutions Committee. I was expecting to be called tomorrow, but here I am a day early, which must be a tribute to the smooth and efficient way in which the business of our session of the Conference has been conducted so far.

On behalf of the Employer members of the Resolutions Committee at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference, I am pleased to recommend, without reservation, the adoption by the Conference of the report of the Committee, the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation, and the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development.

The Employer members of the Resolutions Committee welcomed the opportunity to mark the 75th anniversary of the ILO with a reaffirmation of the principles and fundamental values upon which the ILO was founded. We also welcomed the debate which was going on in plenary based on the Director-General's Report Defending values, promoting change – Social justice in a global economy: An ILO agenda.

While we were keen that our resolution should encourage member States, and employers' and workers' organizations to work together to revitalize the ILO, to renew and adapt its means of action, to improve and optimize the benefits it offers to its constituents and to increase its effectiveness in a changing world environment, we did not consider it appropriate that the Resolutions Committee should prejudge how this should be done. This, we believed, was the duty of the many contributors to the debate held in plenary.

The Director-General will no doubt, in the light of the views expressed in the debate on his Report, present his views on the options available, and the Governing Body will decide how to proceed. That is precisely the eventual conclusion adopted by the Resolutions Committee.

It sounds so simple. Why did it take three meetings, or nearly eight and a half hours to put it together? The answer is also simple and it is to be found in the report of our work. For some in our Committee, the temptation proved too great to load the resolution with matter that did not belong to it. For instance, attempts to incorporate direct and indirect statements relating to a linkage between workers' rights and international trade was one such issue. The many opinions expressed by employers against such a linkage in the plenary debate should have provided ample evidence that consensus on the issue would not have been possible.

Nevertheless, even if it took a long time to formulate, the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation is good and apposite. May the ILO continue to play a useful and effective role in the years ahead and survive to see its 100th anniversary.

In the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development, the Employer members of the Resolutions Committee were keen to ensure that since many of the core issues to be debated at the Summit in Copenhagen in 1995 are central to the mandate and the competence of the ILO, everyone involved should recognize that the ILO has a primary responsibility and role to play in the preparation and conduct of the Summit and in the consideration and implementation of the conclusions which fall within its mandate.

We were also anxious to ensure that since the outcome of the Summit is not likely to be without implications for employers and people at work, that proper provisions should be made to secure the active participation of employers, workers and their respective organizations, as advisers, at all stages of the Summit. In this context, we were somewhat disappointed that the acceptance of our wishes was enveloped in a number of reservations.

All the same, the resolution is a useful reminder to all concerned of the need to take the ILO seriously as a member of the United Nations system and there is no need to create any alternative organization to develop international social standards. I endorse the adoption of the resolution.

This year we had before us the opportunity to adopt a resolution concerning the role of the ILO in the elimination of child labour. I am very sad indeed that the time spent on other preoccupations did not allow the Committee to develop this resolution for consideration. It would have provided a useful opportunity to draw the attention of the world to the plight and misery of some 200 million exploited and abused children. This is a matter that requires immediate and compassionate attention by all caring communities.

Before I leave this platform, I would like to pay a number of small but heartfelt tributes. The first goes to our Chairman who saw us through our difficulties with patience, wisdom and good humour. The second tribute goes to Mr. Tapiola, that formidable representative of the workers who is always keen to introduce what he calls a neutral amendment to a text so long as it advances the cause of his colleagues by whatever measurable distance, however small. It is always a pleasure to engage in a battle of the art of the possible with him and to admire his skills as a composer of ILO poetical interludes or prosaic, down-to-earth amendments. After so many years of combat in the Resolutions Committee, it is hard not to think of him as a friend. The third tribute I want to address is to Mr. von Muralt and his admirable team. Without their patience, dedication, tact and efficiency, our Committee could not function properly. No doubt, Mr. von Muralt will feel that he will have a healthier life without the Committee. But we shall miss him when he is no longer with us.

This leads me to my final point. Next year, there will be no Resolutions Committee. Can there be a session of the Conference without a Resolutions Committee? Will you not miss us? Obviously, only time will tell. But, in the interval, should we not submit an emergency resolution to provide adequate compensation for loss of office for those who have devoted a lifetime to putting resolutions together and who, through no fault of their own, will find their skills surplus to requirements? As a distinguished trade unionist, will the President not help us?

I wish everyone a successful conclusion to this session of the Conference, a safe journey home, and hope you will adopt the resolutions.

Mr. TAPIOLA (Workers' delegate, Finland; Worker Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – The Workers' group is satisfied with the outcome of the Resolutions Committee, and we support the report and the resolutions. We all know how long it takes to obtain even one resolution and towards the end we broke some speed records this time. So, with a much tighter schedule than before, we still managed to adopt two resolutions.

Our initial concern was that we would only adopt resolutions which were procedural. We in the Workers' group wanted to say more than just "Happy birthday ILO" and "It is nice that the ILO will be fully involved in the World Summit for Social Development".

In the end we did say something more. But we would have liked to say more still. I share the view of Mr. Castle that it is a pity, in fact it is a shame, that we did not get down to seriously dealing with child labour. This painful and evil issue remains unaddressed once again in the outcome of the Resolutions Committee. It is encouraging, however, that in the priority vote, this resolution was placed so high up that we at least had a brief general discussion on it and we do have an ILO programme on the topic.

Both resolutions which we are putting before this plenary session stressed that the mandate and tripartite structure of the ILO give it a unique role in the United Nations system. Hopefully then, government representatives here will be successful in conveying this message to their government colleagues in the rest of this system, otherwise we might suspect that governments sometimes speak with two tongues.

In the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation, the first resolution, the following points are particularly important. We reaffirm that the principles and fundamental values of the ILO retain their relevance in a changing world. We note the particular importance of human rights Conventions on freedom of association, collective bargaining, forced labour and discrimination. Of course, a resolution on the elimination of child labour would have completed this important list. We also acknowledge that structural change has a profound effect on the world of work. This requires the ILO to pursue social justice, employment creation and better working conditions.

As to what happens next, our understanding is that the Director-General will process the views presented at this Conference and produce enough substantive material so that the Governing Body can, as of November, start drawing conclusions and making decisions. The result may not be a brave new ILO by this time next year, but the Conference must be able to justifiably expect clear progress towards our agreed goals.

The resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development, the second resolution, is a necessary reminder of why the input of the constituents of the ILO, and of the ILO itself, are so important in the summit process. In the preamble we give the background, spelling out the core issues of the Summit as we, in the ILO, understand them: the expansion of full, freely chosen and productive employment and the reduction of unemployment; the reduction and elimination of poverty; and the promotion of social integration.

On a number of issues, this resolution builds upon discussions which we had last year in the Committee. This concerns particularly the ways in which economic efficiency and growth interact with, and support, social progress and protection. Another such item is the active participation of employers' and workers' organizations in working out in each country policies and ways to follow up the decisions and recommendations of the Summit.

It will be particularly appropriate for the ILO to follow up the Summit when the Governing Body, immediately after the Summit itself, will discuss the next biennium's programme and budget. The ILO is well placed to do something useful and concrete immediately after the Summit.

I wish to underline paragraph 1(c) of the operative part of this resolution, the language of which could be clearer as Mr. Castle has just said. But its intention is clear in the present text too. It covers the ways in which employers' and workers' organizations should be involved in the Summit process. It talks about national involvement, which already takes place. It asks all countries to consider, and hopefully decide on having representatives of these organizations as advisers in their delegations to the Summit. And it asks them to consider how, in practice, the participation of the social partners will be ensured at the Summit itself, which is something which will continue to be discussed and worked out with Ambassador Somavia and his preparatory bodies and team.

I wish to turn now to some reflections on the future, as next year there will be no Resolutions Committee. Those who have seen this Committee as a troublesome factor, a nuisance and a source of problems, conflict and confusion – and who sometimes have difficulties in deciphering its results – may yet find out that, in a year where there is no such committee, there may be trouble elsewhere in the Conference.

The Resolutions Committee has a lightning-rod function, which helps the rest of the Conference to carry out its business relatively peacefully. It is also a place where the political will of the Conference can be measured and, when necessary, distilled into a few words and sentences, which may not be immortal and certainly are not poetry, but which have a certain function.

Where else could we this year have had, in the course of less than two hours, a debate which determined that this Conference was not willing at this time to make pronouncements on the contentious issue of the link between workers' rights and international trade? In one brief but intense discussion, we were able to avoid locking ourselves behind any simplistic view on the issue, so that we can in a sensible way reflect upon it and work upon it in the future.

My concern is that, when there is no Resolutions Committee, a contentious issue might spill over to other parts of the Conference and cause disruption. Let us hope that this will not happen.

In conclusion, I wish to thank sincerely our Chairman, Mr. Gopalan, who competently undertook the conduct of a committee which has its fair share of seasoned performers and which can at times be quite unruly.

I thank once again my friend Mr. Castle for his cooperation and constructive desire to achieve results in this Committee, and I shall join him in any conspiracy to keep at least the spirit of the Resolutions Committee alive. I shall also join in any emergency resolution for just compensation for the slings and arrows to which fortune exposes those now threatened with redundancy due to structural change – honest wage-earners in all sectors who have taken a liking to the subculture of formulating resolutions in order to express what other people really have wanted both to think and to say.

I most cordially thank Mr. von Muralt and his staff. I thank all the sensible and cooperative members of the Employers' group. I thank all Government representatives who again have shared in the quest for results, and I also thank the Worker members of the Committee for their commitment and patience.

Original Spanish: Mr. PEREZ VEGA (Government delegate, Chile) – The Government of Chile's proposal to hold a World Summit for Social Development has been warmly welcomed by the international community, which sees an important and authentic need for such a summit, and by private entities and civilian society because it provides a response to the concerns raised by the intensification of trade and to the challenges encountered on the international scene at the end of this century.

Faced with these challenges, I would like to set before you some considerations which are based on the proposal for productive change that the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean recently drew up for the Social Summit in a document entitled The Social Summit: A vision of Latin America and the Caribbean. The proposal is aimed at providing food for thought for the countries of the region with a view to the meeting in Copenhagen.

This document received the support of the countries of the Commission at a recent meeting held in Cartagena de las Indias. It essentially maintains that growth and equity must develop simultaneously and not consecutively if social development is to take place. This should be achieved through an integrated approach which promotes those economic policies that lead both to growth and equity, but which also promotes social policies which seek effectiveness and efficiency, and not just equity.

The integration of economic and social objectives reflects a vision of more solidarity in society. It presupposes that dispute negotiating mechanisms work properly and it favours tolerance and consensus to unite private and public efforts. Based on this approach, the three issues that will be dealt with by the Summit, fostering social integration, the reduction of poverty and the generation of productive employment, are all aspects of a single movement.

As regards social integration, the Summit will seek a broad consensus for the adoption of standards, codes of ethics and values to strengthen democracy and the participation by citizens at all levels of decision-making. Special emphasis will be laid on the promotion of those groups which, owing to their race, age, ethnic group or other factors, suffer from discrimination, with a view to ensuring greater equality of opportunity. Education and health reform is particularly relevant in this regard.

As regards the reduction of poverty, over and above the effort to ensure durable growth, it is necessary to put into practice policies to increase productivity among the poor, together with a safety net of social policies for the most disadvantaged.

As regards the creation of productive employment, accent should be laid on a set of policies aimed at maintaining high levels of capitalization, at productive technological development, at human resources development and at creating a new relationship between workers and productivity. Cultural exchanges should take place between employers and workers, and protection should be ensured vis-à-vis the inevitable mobility of labour.

This list of issues shows the scope of the challenges to be met with realism and imagination on the threshold of the next century. Of course it would be wrong to think of the Summit itself as a solution to all these problems, but there is no doubt that it will help provide an opportunity to conceive of a better, more secure, more just and freer future than that which would await us if present trends simply continue unchanged.

Indeed the most important thing about this Summit is the process leading up to it. Thanks to the initiative of the Government of Chile, a thought process has begun, with all the member countries of the United Nations, its regional commissions and it specialized agencies such as the ILO participating by making proposals. Our country gives its full support to the resolutions on the World Summit and on the 75th anniversary of the International Labour Organization and its future directions.

Original German: Mr. OHNDORF (Government adviser, Germany) – Originally I did not intend to take the floor. However, I think that since there are so many people present in this forum this afternoon, I would like to take this opportunity to launch an appeal that I already voiced in the Resolutions Committee itself.

This year, I participated in the work of this Committee as a Government delegate for the fourth time, and I must say we carried out an excellent job. I have been involved in the work of a number of committees in the past, and sometimes committees can be somewhat tedious.

The Resolutions Committee, however, is one of the most interesting, and I think that we should express our thanks to the two Vice-Chairpersons who have already spoken – Mr. Castle and Mr. Tapiola. Although they defended the interests of their groups with firmness, they always managed to find a compromise.

And this is what I should like to emphasize. We also, as Government representatives, despite the large spectrum of different interests that we have, managed to produce joint solutions. On no occasion was it necessary to carry out some kind of conflictual vote on any of the resolutions; and I believe that that is a major achievement, in particular, in the case of the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development. This demonstrates the fact that the differences that exist throughout the world in the social field, between the North and the South and also between the countries in transition and the industrialized nations, but also the problems within countries as well, can be overcome and that it is possible for us to find common solutions which set the direction for the future work of us all.

I believe that this Resolutions Committee has demonstrated this goodwill in a magnificent way, both as regards the resolution that I have just mentioned on the World Summit for Social Development; and as regards the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation. Both these resolutions, I believe, are so good that I appeal to the Assembly to adopt them. I believe that we have a fine basis for our future work and I think that we have made a fine contribution to the International Labour Organization and to the World Summit for Social Development; indeed, we have set a standard which I hope, will have some influence upon the whole of the United Nations during the Preparatory Committee for the Social Summit, to be held in New York, and during the Summit itself, to be held in Copenhagen next year.

If our Committee is able to continue in this spirit, then I believe that we shall contribute towards the success of this important meeting.

The PRESIDENT – There being no further speakers on the list, we will move on to the adoption of the report of the Resolutions Committee, which involves not only the adoption of the summary of the Committee's discussion, but also the adoption of the two resolutions submitted by the Committee.

I turn first to the adoption of the report, that is, paragraphs 1 to 278. May I take it that this report is adopted?

(The report is adopted, paragraphs 1 to 278.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ILO AND ITS FUTURE ORIENTATION, SUBMITTED BY THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – Let us now proceed to the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the Committee. The first is the resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation. May I take it that this resolution is unanimously adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE WORLD SUMMIT FOR SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT, SUBMITTED BY THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We also have the resolution concerning the World Summit for Social Development.

May I take it that this resolution is unanimously adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We have completed the consideration of the report and the resolutions submitted by the Resolutions Committee. I would like to thank the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen and the other members of the Committee and the secretariat for the excellent work they have done.

(The Conference adjourned at 5 p.m.)

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III on its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 227 members (109 Government members, 30 Employers' members and 88 Workers' members). It also included 13 Government deputy members, 35 Employers' deputy members and 77 Workers' deputy members.[1] In addition, 22 international non-governmental organizations were represented by observers. In the name of the Committee, the Chair welcomed South Africa's return to the ILO and its representatives' presence in the Committee.

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. J.-J. Elmiger (Government member, Switzerland).

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employers' member, Germany); and Mr. W. Peirens (Workers' member, Belgium).

Reporter: Ms. Khabo J. Dlamini (Government member, Swaziland).

3. The Committee held 19 sittings.

4. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following: (i) information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference; (ii) reports supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution on the application of ratified Conventions; and (iii) reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).[2]

[1] For changes in the composition of the Committee, see the reports of the Selection Committee, Provisional Record Nos. 3 to 3H.

5. As usual, the Committee began its work with a discussion of general aspects of the application of Conventions (particularly ratified Conventions) and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of standards-related obligations under the ILO Constitution. It then discussed the General Survey made by the Committee of Experts on the application of Conventions and Recommendations, on freedom of association and collective bargaining. This year, the general discussion included a third part, devoted to the special section of the Committee of Experts' report in which it joined in the commemoration of the 75th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and reflected on the history and the future of ILO standards. A special day during the present Committee was taken up by this item, a record of which appears hereafter. There are of course certain aspects of the general discussion which are covered in more than one part, but this may be helpful and is in any event not insignificant. Finally, as usual, the Committee considered various individual cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities.

6. The examination of those cases, which was the essential work of the Committee, was based principally on the observations contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and on the oral and written explanations provided by the governments concerned. The Committee also referred to its discussions in previous years, comments received from employers' or workers' organizations and, where appropriate, the reports of other ILO supervisory bodies. In view of the short time available, especially this year, the Committee made a selection among the Committee of Experts' observations and consequently discussed a limited number of cases. The necessity of making this selection in no way affects the conclusion of the Committee of Experts in other cases that, in view of the problems encountered, it would be appropriate to ask the governments concerned to supply information to the present session of the Conference. The Committee trusts that those governments will pay close attention to the requests of the Committee of Experts and will not fail to take the measures required to ensure fulfilment of the obligations they have undertaken. A summary of the information supplied by governments, the discussions in the present Committee and any conclusions it has drawn is set out in Part Two of this report.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

Introduction

7. The Employers' members stated that for several years their views at the beginning of the general discussion were centred on changes, since it is change, development and new ideas which merit the Committee's attention and which should determine what is positive and to be maintained and when it is necessary to pursue new paths. This approach was right also in the year of the Organization's 75th anniversary, and the Employers' members recalled two raison-d'être or motivations at the origin of the ILO. The first was the idealistic one appearing in the opening phrase of the Preamble to the Constitution, linking lasting peace to social justice; the second was the rather pragmatic one similarly appearing in the Preamble, recognizing that social regulation can also increase production costs and that for competitivity's sake it is desirable that humane conditions of work should be accepted and applied in practice universally. In the ILO, not only social questions but also economic ones are dealt with, and the Employers' members considered that the idealistic and the realist approaches were both needed in order to fashion and adapt reality in a positive and effective way.

[2] Report III (Parts 1 to 3) to the International Labour Conference: Summary of Reports (articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution); Report III (Part 4A): Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; Report III (Part 4B): Freedom of association and collective bargaining.

8. The Committee considered how, as the Committee of Experts had noted in their report, the international environment had changed radically in recent years, with, for instance, the end of the cold war, the re-emergence of ethnic and nationalistic conflict, the growth of structural unemployment in the most developed countries, and structural adjustment programmes in some countries — including developing ones. The ILO's standard-setting activities must adapt to these new conditions so that the Organization may meet the challenge of the twenty-first century dynamically and effectively. The Committee accepted this, along with the need to adapt to changes — political, economic, technological — made or being made in the international community. The Government member of China observed that these questions of development, cooperation and progress are the universal aspiration of peoples, and the ILO with its standard-setting activities must be able to respond to its Members' expectations: of special importance in this must be employment promotion and the elimination of poverty and contribution to the reform of the international economic order.

9. There were, however, various opinions of recent events. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom thought the discussions should make use of the Director-General's Report to the Conference as well as the report of the Committee of Experts and was concerned at the tendency to rewrite and reinterpret history. Some of the Workers' members merely see one brutal economic theory replaced by another. If, indeed, progress cannot be stopped and everything is getting better, it is not clear why certain Asian countries are arguing, as they did last year, against universal standards or proposing, as they do this year, such a dangerous resolution as some seen during the time of the communist bloc. The Director-General's Report declares that for most observers it was the economic failure of that system rather than its moral bankruptcy which led to the failure of communism in Eastern Europe, and this is a distortion which champions of the free market wish to promote. That member stated that the free market should not be seen as the answer to all problems, competition cannot replace social justice, and economic reform and structural adjustment are often a pretext for destroying — or at least weakening — the influence of trade unions. Communism was swept aside because it was fundamentally anti-democratic and an affront to human dignity and human rights. The ILO was created to combat any system which does not recognize freedom of association and human rights, and not to praise the virtues of one or another economic system. Happily, the Committee of Experts indicated in paragraph 21 of its report that standards on fundamental human rights "must be observed regardless of economic circumstances or fluctuations" — and, one might add, of economic system.

10. The Employers' and the Workers' members made certain points. Despite the different interpretations of individual members, the Committee's discussions, as in the 70th anniversary celebrations in 1989 (the year when the Berlin Wall collapsed), reflected complete agreement on the permanence of the ILO's basic aims. Support for standard-setting activities and the supervisory system as means of promoting balanced development in justice and freedom and belief in the principle of universality of standards as a framework for economic activities in which the rules of the game are the same for all have not wavered.

11. Several Government (for example, Belgium, China, Egypt, Kenya, Japan, Morocco, Portugal) and Workers' (for example, China, Korea, Tunisia) members also expressed their conviction of the relevance and necessity of standard-setting activity in the ILO in relation to particular questions and situations.

12. The Workers' member of Pakistan stressed that workers in the Third World are especially attached to the principles laid down in the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. Standards were at the root of the Organization and the reason why it is called the "World Parliament of Labour". Basic standards on human rights, freedom of association, abolition of forced labour and child labour and prohibition of all discrimination should be observed by all, and the world should not be divided into first and second class citizens. The Government member of Belgium called for an enlarged concept of fundamental standards not limited to the six "classic" Conventions but including others, as the Workers' members said, such as the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

13. The Government member of Belgium thought at the same time that positive developments did not mean it was not necessary to remain vigilant. The Workers' member of France also noted that some questions were raised as regards standard-setting which ought not to be. Some countries sometimes say that standards do not have to follow the criteria for their evaluation. Standards have been seen as incompatible with the aim of full employment, and this was an important and fundamental question. Despite possible weaknesses in the full employment standards, there was no reason to question the principle of adoption and application of standards or the idea of standards itself, which remains the essence of the ILO.

14. Many speakers referred to paragraphs 19 and 21 of the Committee of Experts' report. Adapting to change goes together with the problem of flexibility in standards. This old debate is linked to the issue of universality and becomes more urgent as economic and social development accelerates in a context of globalization and pressure for deregulation. Paragraph 19 mentions the revision and updating of standards. In paragraph 21, the Committee of Experts noted that implementation of certain standards such as those on social security or paid leave can have direct repercussions on national economic policy and on individual enterprises, and thought it important to bear in mind the economic impact of such standards, so that the cost does not become a disincentive to ratification.

15. The aim of flexibility in standards is not often contested, although there are different attitudes in the interpretation of the notion and the desired degree of flexibility. As certain Workers' members (such as those of Germany and Tunisia) expressly stated, trade unions are not against flexibility in the sphere of labour so long as equilibrium between workers' and employers' interests is not damaged to the detriment of the former. Flexibility must not mean enabling governments to apply or not to apply standards or to interpret them as they wish. The Workers' member of Germany observed that many Conventions contain flexibility clauses enabling their scope to be limited (such as Nos. 102 and 119), so that the small numbers of ratifications of them cannot be attributed to lack of flexibility. The controversy on this subject was out of place. For new Conventions, there should be as concrete provisions as possible, in order to avoid doubt as to their purpose; and he thought the Employers' members were self-contradictory when they came out in favour of Conventions with no concrete content while at the same time criticizing the supervisory system, whose function is to give substance to the contents of Conventions.

16. The Workers' members of Guatemala and Uruguay, referring to paragraph 21 of the report of the Committee of Experts, disagreed with the distinction drawn between social security and paid leave standards on the one hand and basic human rights standards on the other: human rights should be viewed as a whole, and social security and paid leave are part of the human rights to be protected. The economic problems of Latin America result from other causes than social security spending. Neoliberal policies executed without consultation of workers' organizations go to destroy the social fabric, undo national solidarity, prevent the achievement of social justice and, moreover, seriously threaten explosive social consequences. This was reason enough, in their view, to resist flexibility imposed on workers, and the ILO would be the ideal forum for discussion of the issues, so that its role takes on particular importance and relevance.

Relations of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee

17. In response to the wish expressed last year by the Committee, the Director-General again invited the Chair of the Committee of Experts to attend the work of the Committee as an observer. Mr. Ruda recalled that last year's experience, when the Committee of Experts was for the first time given the opportunity to be represented in the Conference Committee, was for him and the other experts an instructive and enriching one: instructive because it enabled them to see more closely how the present Committee works, with its own customs and traditions, which should lay the groundwork for better mutual understanding between the two Committees; and enriching because it facilitated a better appreciation of the concerns, policies and aims of the present Committee, which should improve communications between the two. Mr. Ruda explained how the reports of the Committee of Experts which are placed before the present

Committee are the fruit of intense reflection. The part of the report headed "Seventy-fifth anniversary of the ILO" and the General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining were the most significant contributions of the Committee of Experts to this year's anniversary. At the end of the general discussion, Mr. Ruda again noted the attention given to the work of the Committee of Experts, which stimulated that Committee further: negative and positive comments alike would be transmitted to his colleagues, who would accord them the same attention. What counts most is that the work of the Committee of Experts should have the consideration it deserves as regards both general ideas and the concrete application of standards by States. The two bodies follow a common path laid down in the Constitution towards universal peace founded on social justice, and this involves the commitment, cooperation, solidarity of all concerned.

18. The Committee hailed the high quality of the report of the Committee of Experts, prepared as ever on the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality and forming the essential basis for its discussions. It welcomed the positive response of the Committee of Experts to this second invitation issued to it, and the Government member of the United States hoped such participation would become a new tradition. The Workers' members considered that cooperation between the two Committees was enhanced by the presence of Mr. Ruda, tangible proof of which was there in the report of the Committee of Experts and the General Survey, as was also noted by the Government member of Portugal. The Workers' member of France, who last year was hesitant, this year joined the consensus on this point. The Employers' members welcomed that there were now three women members of the Committee of Experts. They also greeted the presence of the Chair of the Committee of Experts as a factor in the better understanding between the two bodies. It should yet be remembered that the dialogue between the two Committees was an internal one, and the main aim was to engage in dialogue with member States. To that end, it was important for the two Committees to agree wherever possible.

19. The Committee again expressed its wish that the Director-General should invite the Chair of the Committee of Experts to be present as an observer at its general discussion next year.

20. The Employers' members referred to paragraphs 24 and following of the Committee of Experts' report concerning the supervisory system, especially the indications of the respective functions of the two Committees. They welcomed the new approach of the Committee of Experts: whereas in 1990 they had concluded that, so long as the International Court of Justice did not contradict them, the Committee of Experts' interpretations might be regarded as valid and commonly accepted, in 1991 they had substantially changed their stance. The Committee of Experts recognized that their views could not be considered binding, that their opinions had no erga omnes effect, and that the fact that the Employers' members — or, where applicable, the Committee as a whole — reserved the right to dissent from those opinions was not incompatible with that position. The Committee of Experts now took a historical view of the supervisory bodies' work, and this year's report gave some space to the motives of the historical "legislator". Clearly, the increasing numbers of reports were what was behind the wish to create the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts in 1926, initially only provisionally. The experts described their job as technical and legal supervision, not subject to group interests, and they concluded with some observations. For the experts, the supervision exercised by the Conference Committee, not described in detail, was essentially a dialogue between Governments and Employers' and Workers' members; the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts had different but complementary functions.

21. The Employers' members' three comments on these observations did not concern the binding nature of the two bodies' comments. First, they wondered whether the roles of the two bodies are really different: they both had the aim of establishing whether member States meet their obligations, and for the present Committee this is laid down in article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. It was also true that the Committee of Experts' tasks are purely technical and preparatory, as indicated when they were initially laid down and were substantially unchanged since then. The Committee of Experts is to inform the Conference and the Committee of the Conference "as to the facts". It was also recognized that "the Committee of experts would have no judicial capacity, nor would it be competent to give interpretations of the provisions of the Conventions nor to decide in favour of one interpretation rather than of another" (sic — see International Labour Conference, Eighth Session, 1926, Part Three, Appendix V, pages 395, 398 and 405). Thus, according to the Employers' members, the Conference Committee's supervisory role, like any other, can only be performed if there are concrete conceptions of the legal content and extent of the obligations on member States. The Conference Committee makes regular use of the preparatory work of the Committee of Experts, but there is no obligation to follow the comments of the experts exclusively or be bound by them. Only the International Court of Justice may give binding interpretations. The two Committees are considered complementary, with no hierarchical relation between them.

22. The Employers' members further thought there might be a contradiction in the description in the Committee of Experts' report, and that this should be avoided. The Committee of Experts was presented as a body responsible for technical supervision being outside of group interests and impartial, the Conference Committee as a political body with a highlighted tripartite structure. The Employers' members wished to avoid contrasting objectivity and impartiality with tripartism and policy, which gave the impression that the comments of the Committee of Experts were of higher value and standing. Such an attitude would be totally incomprehensible in a specifically tripartite organization where all the main organs, including the Committee on Freedom of Association, whose opinions are much appreciated by those who gain from them, are tripartite and thus — in terms of what has been said — "political".

23. The Workers' members recalled that the two Committees always worked in a spirit of openness and constructive dialogue. They were complementary, each with its own responsibilities. The Conference Committee on Standards, in virtue of its tripartite composition, guaranteed contact with the feelings of the practical protagonists; the Committee of Experts, in virtue of its composition and working methods, guaranteed the serenity and impartiality essential to the interpretation of Conventions and its examination on the basis of guiding and unchanging principles. The Workers' members wished to continue to work in the spirit of constructive dialogue which enabled the vast majority of the Committee's conclusions to be adopted by consensus.

24. The Workers' speaker was thus surprised by the Employers' members' position as to the respective roles of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee and their reaction concerning the credibility of the experts, and he referred to the statements of the Workers' members of France, Germany and the United Kingdom on that point.

25. Those speakers criticized the Employers' members' arguments in often strong terms. They pointed out that their position was different in the discussion of the Committee's working methods in 1979-80 and in the discussion of the Director-General's Report on standards in 1984, when it was confirmed that system for supervising the application of standards was founded on legal evaluation by independent experts followed by examination by a tripartite body. They reflected on the reasons for such a change of attitude; and if the authority of the Committee of Experts — and thus of the supervisory system — were not to be undermined, it should be considered the final instance, so long as governments do not have recourse to the International Court of Justice (ICJ). Nobody questions the authority of the ICJ, but the reasons why there had been practically no recourse to it in 75 years should be clarified.

26. The Government members who spoke on this question, those of Germany, Morocco, Portugal and the United States, confirmed their confidence in the objectivity, independence and impartiality of the Committee of Experts and the complementary roles of the two supervisory bodies and stressed the need for dialogue and cooperation in aid of a common purpose.

27. In reply to the Workers' members' critique, the Employers' members said they found it unconvincing and no one wished to belittle the work of the Committee of Experts or sap its authority, as some Workers' members seemed to pretend. The Employers' members said they had done nothing but what the experts did when they drew attention to historical developments, and like the experts they noted that the experts were not trying to have the last word. When they disagreed with the experts on a question, they did so openly, unlike others, and were criticized for that. Yet they believe in the ILO's promising future, with the work of the experts unimpaired. They are convinced that the present Committee can only obtain results when employers and workers are at one, and this was so 10, 15 and 20 years ago as it is today.

Ratifications and denunciations of Conventions

28. Every year, the report of the Committee of Experts draws up a balance sheet of the obligations on member States relating to instruments adopted by the Conference. As in any balance sheet, there are credits — the ratifications — and debits — the denunciations.

29. The Committee was informed that 398 ratifications from 38 member States were registered in 1993, bringing the total as at 31 December 1993 to 6,050. As the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out in his opening statement, 192 ratifications were registered between 1 June 1993 and 1 June 1994. These are record figures to be seen, in part, alongside the increased number of member States from 148 to 171 in four years.

30. The Workers' members welcomed the higher number of ratifications, even allowing for those made by new member States. They found it encouraging as a concrete and immediate sign of the support of member States and their employers' and workers' organizations for the principles and values of the ILO, a point also made by Government members (for example, those of China and Portugal). It should give pause for thought to those incessantly and obstinately calling for revision of Conventions, said the Workers' members. Even countries where administrative and organizational constraints affect capacity to ratify might ratify Conventions on human rights and other priority ones such as the Employment Policy Convention (No. 122), the labour inspection ones (Nos. 81 and 129) and that on tripartite consultations (No. 144). The Conventions on workers' basic rights are the heart and backbone of the ILO and make no direct imposition on labour costs, and this was in line with paragraph 21 of the report of the Committee of Experts.

31. The Workers' members noted that several Governments supported promotional activities for standards, and the Government member of China had described his positive attitude to standards and promotion of them as part of the reforms leading to a market economy. That attitude should be given substance in a higher number of ratifications of basic as well as technical standards.

32. The Government member of Belgium referred to his country's experience, where the 75th anniversary has been the occasion for examining a series of possible new ratifications. The Workers' members pointed to the interest of that, as showing how unfounded the reasons for non-ratification can be; and to the usefulness of General Surveys in looking at the difficulties in the way of ratification of Conventions. Instruments should be quickly submitted to the competent authorities, and promotion of standards and the Committee of Experts' reports should extend to parliamentary and judicial bodies.

33. Information on ratifications completed, proceeding or envisaged was communicated to the Committee by other governments. The Government member of Germany said that in spring 1994 his Government had drafted a law to ratify Conventions Nos. 161 and 164, which had been submitted to the competent legislative authorities, and that ratification would be voted on shortly; Conventions Nos. 163, 165 and 166 had been submitted but it was not intended to ratify them. He said the Parliament criticized the delay before which Conventions and Recommendations were submitted to it, and a new procedure to remedy the situation was envisaged. The Government member of Australia announced preparation of a national plan of action to ratify some 28 Conventions, including Conventions Nos. 97, 141, 143, 151, 154 and Conventions on safety and health. The Government member of China said the Government was examining ILO instruments in detail in order to promote ratifications: Convention No. 170 concerning chemicals was submitted by the Government to the standing committee of the National Chinese People's Congress for consideration and should be ratified shortly. The Government member of Nigeria mentioned ratification of Conventions Nos. 144 and 155. The Government member of Portugal announced ratification of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention (No. 102) and the Radiation Protection Convention (No. 115), and approval for ratification of Conventions Nos. 158 on termination of employment and 171 on night work, by the National Assembly. The Workers' member of Argentina indicated that a working party created by the four members of MERCOSUR (Argentina, Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay) had reached agreement on ratification of 34 important ILO Conventions, and a tripartite committee of MERCOSUR and central trade union organizations in the four countries had drafted a charter of basic rights with ILO assistance.

34. The Workers' members hoped the ratification procedures initiated by governments would lead to other governments taking similar steps.

35. The representative of the Secretary-General remarked on the absence of "pure" denunciations between June 1993 and the present, and on the five denunciations resulting from the ratification of a revising Convention. The total of denunciations not resulting from ratification of a revising Convention since 1919 was 72 as of 25 February 1994. The Government member of Kenya pointed out that the risk of denunciations can be minimized by the flexibility of standards which enables them to be ratified and applied by countries at different stages of economic development.

Reports on ratified Conventions

The obligation to report

36. The Committee again expressed its concern at failures to meet the constitutional obligation to supply reports, as noted by the Committee of Experts, since this is the very basis of the system of periodic supervision.

37. The Employers' and Workers' members and several Government members (China, Egypt, Germany, Morocco, Portugal, United Kingdom) regretted the continuing decline in that respect: the percentage of reports received (64.6 in February 1994) was lower than in 1993, which was in turn the lowest for 45 years. Only a quarter of reports received come by the due date, and in too many instances they do not contain the necessary replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies.

38. As the Employers' and Workers' members observed, the fact that one-third of States Members do not entirely fulfil their reporting obligations seriously affects the effectiveness of the supervisory system. Failure to reply to the comments of the supervisory bodies and poor quality of reports received impede the dialogue between the Committee of Experts and the present Committee, as the Workers' members regretfully noted, dialogue and cooperation being the cornerstone of the ILO's supervisory system. The Workers' member of Finland, speaking also on behalf of the Workers' members of the Nordic countries, agreed, while more generally drawing attention to paragraph 43 of the report of the Committee of Experts: "The obligation to report should not be regarded as a merely formal obligation, but more as a means for governments to take stock periodically of the state of their labour legislation using instruments that they have ratified voluntarily as a gauge."

39. After analysing the causes of this odd situation, the Workers' members refuted the argument of administrative constraints often advanced, since the great majority of questions raised need only simple replies. To them it seemed to be more a question of the order of governments' and labour administrations' priorities. The Employers' and Workers' members supported the Committee of Experts' call for national administrations and employers' and workers' organizations to participate more actively in the supervisory system.

40. The Committee joins the Committee of Experts in hoping that the new adjustment of regular supervisory procedures decided on by the Governing Body in November 1993 will enable member States better to meet their obligations under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the ILO Constitution.

41. For the Employers' members, revision and strengthening of the procedures linked to reporting obligations are crucial, since this is at the heart of the entire supervisory system. The new arrangements adopted by the Governing Body are regarded as an absolute minimum below which it would be impossible to obtain positive results.

42. The Workers' members also consider the new arrangement of regular reporting procedures should enable the difficulties referred to be overcome: they had not seen the need for them, but did not question them now the Governing Body decision was taken, especially as it was gratifying to note they largely meet the criteria and conditions they specified last year. These related to the special attention to be given to Conventions concerning basic rights and others considered as priority ones, examination outside the normal cycle of cases where there are serious implementation problems, and bringing forward the date of the Committee of Experts' report to allow for better preparation for the Conference. The Workers' members said they will closely follow the implementation of the new procedures adopted for a trial five-year period and will assess them in due course.

43. The Government members mentioned above agreed that the rearrangements should lighten the tasks of administrations and thus permit governments better to fulfil their constitutional obligations. In particular, the Government member of the United Kingdom hoped the new procedures would be implemented quickly; the Government member of Portugal hoped they would not lead to weakening of the supervisory system. The Government member of China observed that these new arrangements do not exhaust the wider question of improvement of the supervisory machinery and standard setting in general.

Examination of reports

Cases of progress and practical application

44. The Employers' and Workers' members and several Government members (for example, China, Egypt, Morocco, Portugal, the United States) welcomed the new cases of progress in the application of ratified Conventions and that the Committee of Experts referred to 42 cases in 30 States and one non-metropolitan territory, where following its comments steps have been taken to change the national law or practice as required. These are tangible proof of the impact of standards and the efficacity of the supervisory system, and the recompense for dialogue steadfastly maintained in different quarters.

45. The Government member of the United States considered that the present Committee should try to analyse the data more and she noted that this year the cases of progress included 12 countries whose problems were discussed in the Committee in the last ten years: four of them were dealt with in special paragraphs. The Workers' members agreed with the Government members mentioned that the cases concerning basic and priority Conventions were encouraging, as were those concerning developing countries. Nevertheless, the Workers' members considered the progress too slow sometimes and regretted that the supervisory bodies in some cases had to return to cases discussed for several years. The Government member of Belgium called for examination of the meaning of persistent cases, the lessons of which should be drawn in legal and practical terms.

46. The Employers' members referred to paragraph 144 of the Committee of Experts' report as regards appropriate sanctions designed to ensure the observance of measures taken to apply Conventions, and thought the possibilities for imposing appropriate sanctions for non-compliance with the obligations resulting from the Conventions were limited, as the ILO could request that a specific sanction be applied only if the Convention in question provided for it. As this occurred only in a few instances, sanctions were usually provided for by national legal systems, and therefore differed accordingly.

Other supervisory procedures

47. The Employers' members referred to the Committee of Experts' statement in its report (paragraph 31), that the procedure laid down in article 19 of the Constitution as to general surveys of instruments chosen by the Governing Body was not strictly a supervisory one, that the importance of general surveys examining the effect given to unratified Conventions and Recommendations had, however, continued to increase, and that they were a point of reference for the whole supervisory system. The Employers' members regarded this as applying very largely to this year's General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining. Yet they considered that such general surveys did not contain binding interpretations of controversial questions.

48. The Employers' members referred to paragraph 33 of the Committee of Experts' report describing the supervisory bodies established for the special complaints procedure relating to freedom of association. They considered the Committee on Freedom of Association to have no wider powers than those of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission, created at the same time but never having really been able to carry out regular functions. The Committee on Freedom of Association was a sort of preliminary investigation for the Governing Body. Its functions had changed since then and it acquired "jurisdiction" and was often considered by some people to be competent to make almost binding interpretations. However, this was not foreseen by the Constitution of the ILO.

49. The Workers' members recalled the crucial role of the Committee on Freedom of Association in defence of basic rights and noted that the number of complaints was rising in recent years despite the process of political democratization, which did not automatically increase respect for social standards.

Although serious violations such as physical interference with trade unionists and denial of the right of organizations to exist were perhaps diminishing, violations of basic rights were at the same time becoming more complex and sophisticated. Several countries were only partially democratized and democratic principles were hard to implement in social and economic life. The Workers' member of Argentina referred to the situation in Latin America, whence came almost half of the cases examined between 1985 and 1994 by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

50. The Employers' members said that the direct contacts procedure mentioned in paragraph 35 of the Committee of Experts' report had often been welcomed by them and deserved their full support in future. It was not strictly a supervisory procedure but allowed the Office to give various services requested of it, and the Employers' members considered it a means of promoting the application of standards which was at least as useful as the traditional supervisory mechanism. The Workers' members noted that all the missions expected had taken place including those resulting from the conclusions of the present Committee in its discussion of individual cases. The success of a direct contacts mission accepted by a government was also a question of respect for dialogue, although the Workers' members warned against using the procedure or more generally technical cooperation merely as a means of delaying or evading discussion at the Conference.

51. The Employers' members raised doubts as to whether access to the supervisory procedures, as mentioned by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 36 of its report, could be opened to individuals. That would require new bodies and new procedures, a matter which merited further examination.

52. The Government member of Nicaragua also doubted whether other voluntary mechanisms, such as a system of mediation and arbitration, should be established on a permanent basis as suggested by the Director-General in his Report, to supplement the present ILO supervisory procedures. First, national authorities should recognize labour disputes, and intervention by an international instance in such cases might turn to interference in internal affairs. Such a mechanism could not replace commissions of inquiry or the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission, which had a different purpose, and their voluntary nature would be very relative since, as with direct contacts, refusal to accept them would be interpreted negatively.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

53. The Employers' and Workers' members and the Government members who spoke on this question (for example, Nicaragua, Portugal) shared the views generally expressed by the Committee of Experts on the participation of such organizations in the supervisory system (paragraphs 46 to 51 of the report) and looked for an increasing role for them as a result of the rearrangement of procedures adopted by the Governing Body.

54. The Employers' members agreed with the opinion in paragraph 50 of the Committee of Experts' report that progress in the organization of consultations could help solve problems in applying standards at the national level and avoid reference to an international body. The Workers' member of Ghana remarked that in developing countries governments were indifferent to the problems of trade unions, who thus had to raise them at the international level.

55. The Workers' members and the Government member of Portugal pointed to the record 251 observations of employers' and workers' organizations referred to by the Committee of Experts, which was explained not only by government failings but also by the increasing number of breaches of standards, including basic rights: such breaches were becoming more sophisticated and complex, as already stated, and the Workers' members considered that the increased number of comments by employers and workers was in part due to their assumption of some governmental responsibility. They hoped the Office would let employers' and workers' organizations have the necessary financial and technical means for discharging their additional tasks and responsibilities. The Workers' member of France also called for further efforts by the Office to provide information on standards and procedures and to promote them and he asked governments to observe the principle of tripartism in delegations going to standards-related meetings. The representative of the Secretary-General, responding to a question concerning the despatch of the report of the Committee of Experts to national employers' and workers' organizations, indicated that unfortunately the Standards Department did not have the resources, as there would be some 800 of them; the competent branches of the Office would, nevertheless, be contacted to see if it was physically possible to satisfy the request of the Workers' member of France.

56. As the Government member of Nicaragua and the Workers' member of Finland observed, Convention No. 144 was a suitable means for involving employers' and workers' organizations more closely in the preparation of reports and the elaboration and application of standards. Of course, the aim of that Convention was to promote procedures in each member State to ensure effective consultations between representatives of governments, employers and workers on questions concerning international labour standards and the fulfilment of related constitutional obligations. The 61 ratifications of the Convention were generally considered insufficient and, in concurrence with the Committee of Experts, urgent appeals were made in the Committee, particularly by the Workers' members and the Government members of Nicaragua and Portugal, for the Convention to be more widely ratified as a matter of urgency. The application of principles was a different matter from ratification and some failures as regards tripartite consultation were pointed out by the Workers' member of Argentina in respect of Latin American countries, including those nine which had ratified Convention No. 144.

Questions concerning the application of certain Conventions

Application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29)

57. The Employers' members expressed their complete indignation at the problem of exploitation of children, especially through prostitution and pornography and a related kind of tourism, as mentioned in the comments of the Committee of Experts on Convention No. 29. The Workers' members associated themselves with the Employers in this respect.

58. The Workers' members also noted that the experts quite rightly gave special attention to the problem of contemporary slavery, especially of children: child labour in most cases was forced labour and was often a form of economic exploitation which violated fundamental rights of the child and human rights in general as guaranteed in several ILO Conventions and in Conventions adopted in the United Nations. Political will was essential if child labour was to be stopped, and poverty was of course in part responsible, but child labour was most often due to inequitable policy for income distribution and equal opportunities, especially when there was no sound policy in the spheres of budget and education. The Workers' members supported the position of the Committee of Experts placing responsibility on the whole international community when children were subjected to forced labour and especially exploitation through prostitution and pornography, and they too wished to see advertising and promotion of such practices in countries and regions where those tourists come from prohibited. The Workers' members also pointed out that 135 countries had ratified Convention No. 29, and that this demonstrated the dynamic interaction between basic standards and the world social order. They also referred to the ILO's interdepartmental programme for the elimination of child labour, the aim of which was in particular to promote the ratification of Conventions related to child labour and the improvement of their application.

59. In view of the support given to the position of the Committee of Experts on child labour and the application of Convention No. 29, the Workers' members wished all Government members to draw their authorities' attention to the experts' comments. The Government member of Portugal agreed with the Committee of Experts and the appeal to member States to eradicate such practices.

Application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

60. The Workers' members noted that, as usual, the Committee of Experts made general comments on the Application of Convention No. 122. Reports from 47 States and eight non-metropolitan territories examined this year dealt with the same period as last year, i.e. 1990-92. The comments in paragraphs 91 to 94 of the report of the Committee of Experts should be read together with those in paragraphs 52 to 57 of the 1993 report, as mentioned by the Workers' members, who recalled that the Committee of Experts was very concerned with practical commitment to full employment under Convention No. 122 and with social dialogue, confirming these points this year, whilst adding other important observations.

61. The Workers' members referred to the Committee of Experts' comments in paragraph 91 of its report, that the phenomenon of economic growth without improvement in the employment situation as in some countries was a new reason for concern, in so far as it could lead to structural changes which would be unfavourable to employment in the long term. The Workers' members considered that active and coordinated measures did not seem to be being taken to deal with the structural crisis.

62. The Employers' members disagreed with this view and thought there was no proof that the negative effects on employment of productivity increases outweigh the employment creation flowing from increased production. There was no automatic link between economic growth and a relative decline in numbers of jobs, and the factors affecting employment levels in recent years could not be ignored, such as increasing employment in the services sector, slower capital intensification, reduction in average working time, greater use of part-time work and a growing tendency to use other manpower policy measures. Unemployment resulted not only from loss of jobs. The number of workers employed in OECD member States had grown by almost 25 per cent between 1970 and 1992, which meant some 80 million people had found new jobs. However, this impressive growth did not keep pace with the number of jobseekers, so that greater growth and economic activity were necessary. The real problem was not employment reduction but an insufficient level of employment creation.

63. The Workers' member of Pakistan noted that in several developing countries economic growth was accompanied by employment creation which was capital-intensive instead of favouring in the short term labour-intensive methods. The Workers' members in general rejected any misunderstanding which might result from this exchange of views: there was no disagreement with the Employers as to the relationship between growth and employment, since growth was obviously indispensable in solving unemployment problems.

64. The Workers' members agreed with the Committee of Experts in paragraph 92 of its report, that most often macro-economic policy objectives tended to favour overcoming inflation and public finance. They stressed the predominance of monetary policy objectives, which meant that employment was really the only adjustment variable. The Workers' members agreed with the Government member of Belgium in referring to meetings such as the G7 or the Council of Ministers of Finance of the European Union (ECOFIN), which on the basis of economic and monetary criteria adopted recommendations and decisions affecting employment policy without consulting ministries of labour or the social partners. The Workers' members were concerned that the effect on employment of privatization, especially the Workers' members of Ghana and Pakistan, who referred to the social cost of structural adjustment programmes imposed by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The recommendations and conditions put particularly by the IMF, the World Bank and the OECD often or sometimes completely ignore the objectives and the requirements of Convention No. 122.

65. The Employers' members did not share the concerns expressed in paragraph 92 of the Committee of Experts' report, that governments favour growth over employment. To stimulate economic activity in a country it was necessary to have monetary stability, a solid national budget, a responsible political economy, a reasonable and effective system of collective bargaining and labour legislation, and a responsible policy on wages and working time, to encourage private initiative and production. Full employment could not be an absolute objective and could not be realized to the detriment of other aims in the long term.

66. The Workers' members noted that some member States considered that an active labour market policy and flexibilization of its operation were sufficient to pursue the aims of the Convention, whilst the Committee of Experts considered that member States should see to it that the impact of the Convention was not reduced because of labour market policy alone. As for paragraph 93 of the report of Committee of Experts, the Employers' members considered that the tendency to pursue employment and labour market policies in this way should be resisted when it led to the creation of a secondary or unstable labour market. In the long term intervention and subsidization could be no substitute for market economy mechanisms, and a negative effect on the labour market would be inevitable. It was contradictory to demand the end of a centrally planned economy and the lack of liberty it entailed, and at the same time repeatedly call for greater state intervention in the economy and society.

67. The Workers' members refuted the alleged contradiction between employment policy and efficient social protection: employment, workers and conditions of work could not be considered as variables. International standards created a universal framework in which employers' and workers' organizations and governments could organize the labour markets and socio-economic policy to take account of local possibilities, and this was the experts' opinion when they stated that "the goals of raising standards of living and promoting equity of employment policy should not be forgotten when, for example, the reduction of the minimum wage is envisaged to favour greater flexibility in the labour market" (paragraph 92 of the report of the Committee of Experts). The Workers' members recalled the discussion of the 1992 general survey on minimum wage fixing: Convention Nos. 26, 99 and 131 guaranteed minimum wage fixing which was fair for all categories of workers, taking account in particular of inflation and changes in the incomes of other sections of the population. The Workers' member of France strongly supported the experts on this point, since they fully understood that respect for standards was indispensable at a time when ultraliberalism was an excuse to promote maximum flexibility. The market's dynamism must be countered by standards.

68. The Workers' members noted that the Committee of Experts also recalled in several cases the importance of giving effect to Convention No. 122 as regards consultation of employers' and workers' organizations and other sectors of the active population. They referred to the absence of real consultation of the social partners, who were met with a minimalist attitude or even a negative one in respect of social dialogue both in industrialized and in developing countries, and this was in their view a major violation of the Employment Policy Convention.

69. The Workers' members hoped that the comments of the Committee of Experts and the present Committee on the application of Convention No. 122 would be taken into account for the general discussion on employment policies in a world perspective placed on the agenda of the 83rd Session of the Conference in 1996.

Application of standards in particular circumstances: Export enterprises and industrial zones, maritime labour standards

70. The Workers' member of Argentina regretted that the Committee of Experts' report contained no special paragraph on international maritime registers or export processing zones.

71. The representative of the Secretary-General drew the Committee's attention to the Committee of Experts' observations this year under Convention No. 147 on merchant shipping, addressed to several countries where there were "flags of convenience" according to the criteria of the International Transport Workers' Federation. He also confirmed that the Committee of Experts was still following the application of ratified Conventions in export-processing zones and that this year it had again made comments in its general survey and in observations concerning individual countries.

Technical cooperation and standards

72. The Committee noted with interest the information in the Committee of Experts' report on the technical assistance given relating to standards, which in various ways included direct contact missions, visits and missions by technical advisers on standards, regional and subregional seminars, training programmes for officials of national labour administrations, advisory services relating to international labour standards and labour legislation projects.

73. The Employers' and Workers' members noted that employers' and workers' organizations were requesting ever more technical assistance from the Office in order to meet their increased responsibilities, and this showed their appreciation of the interest and value of assistance given. Several Government members (for example, China, Colombia, Egypt, Japan, Morocco) spoke of activities in their countries and supported the various programmes, underlining the positive effects of help given, especially to strengthen the capacity of labour ministries.

74. The Committee joined the Committee of Experts in noting with interest the setting up of multidisciplinary teams in the regions. The Workers' member of Argentina stressed the need for each team to have a standards adviser, and the representative of the Secretary-General described the present situation in the Regions in this respect. Various statements in the Committee showed agreement with the experts that this form of assistance was a new phase in the symbiosis between the ILO's standard-setting and technical cooperation activities, in the context of the implementation of the active partnership policy.

75. The Employer's members found paragraphs 52 and 53 of the Committee of Experts' report too restrictive as to the relation between technical cooperation and standards. The Employers' members considered it was said in those paragraphs that technical cooperation had the main aim of promoting the better application of standards. In their view there should be interplay and synergy between standards and technical cooperation, and this meant that also technical cooperation experience should be taken into account in the elaboration of standards.

76. The representative of the Secretary-General noted the interest shown by governments and employers' and workers' organizations in technical assistance and indicated that demand in this area was much greater than ability to offer. He confirmed that he was continuing to reorganize the Standards Department internally so as to free greater resources for technical assistance, although that must in no way affect the quality of work of the secretariat of the supervisory bodies. Supervision of the application of standards was and would remain the absolute priority of the ILO's Standards Department.

Relations between the ILO and other international organizations

77. The Workers' members considered that cooperation between the ILO and other international organizations should be intensified. As in the case of indigenous and tribal peoples, the cooperation relating for example to child labour, forced labour in the widest sense of the term, migrant workers' rights and the prevention of discrimination should be intensified and made more active. The conclusions of the final declaration of the World Conference on Human Rights (Vienna, 14 to 25 June 1993) should be closely followed as regards social rights.

78. The Workers' members noted that in fields other than human rights, there should also be intensified collaboration between the ILO and international financial, economic and trade organizations such as the IMF, the World Bank and the new World Trade Organization. The ILO should be involved in the programmes, activities, studies and regulations of those organizations, especially as regards social and employment matters. The Workers' members drew governments' attention to the fact that the budget, staff and resources of the World Bank were much greater than those of the ILO, which had to limit itself to zero growth in its budget. Member States must make the necessary means available to the ILO for it to fulfil its mandate.

79. The Workers' members stated that the opinion of the Court of Justice of the European Union delivered on 19 March 1993 should enable clarification of certain questions of competence as between the Union and the ILO. Preparatory work for the Conference relating to standards partly within the competence of the European Union should be improved, and relations between the ILO and the Union should be regulated so that the rate of ratification might improve substantially. Tripartite consultation at the national and European levels should be ensured and the social chapter of the Maastricht Treaty provided for a consultation mechanism. The Workers' members considered that the social standards of the European Union, especially the European Directive on children and young persons, should take account of ILO standards.

80. The Employers' members and the Government member of Germany observed that no final decision on the relative competence of member States and the European Union Commission had yet been taken in relation to matters dealt with by the International Labour Organization. The Government member of Belgium hoped efforts would be made to improve such relations and enable States to fulfil their obligations. The European Union should deal with the problem raised when its own decision making processes prevented States from ratifying and placed them in a delicate position as to discharge of their international commitments. He agreed with the Workers' members that the European Union should not damage national tripartite consultations or try to establish a second code of international labour standards sometimes inferior to existing standards. The ILO should not on the other hand be unduly afraid of the development of regional cooperation, since it could have a favourable economic effect. Social dialogue should be realized at the level of the Union and effective consultations should be provided for at that level in order to improve cooperation.

81. The representative of the Secretary-General replied to various Committee members' questions as to the ratification of Conventions by the European Union and reassured the Committee that there was no conflict between the ILO and the European Commission Secretariat. The Office had always been available to supply information or assistance as required, and the ILO's member States which have ratified Conventions should be informed by the Commission of any implications of a draft directive on the application of ILO Conventions. If the Commission did not do that, the ILO would do so as far as possible by way of information and without any ulterior motive.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the ILO Constitution

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87); the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

82. The Committee held a fruitful and in-depth discussion on the General Survey of the Committee of Experts which examined the effect given to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948, (No. 87) and the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, (No. 98). Besides the information provided in the reports communicated under article 19 of the Constitution, the Committee of Experts also examined the information received under article 22 of the Constitution from member States having ratified the Conventions in question. The survey also took due account of the comments received from employers' and workers' organizations to whom government reports had been transmitted by virtue of article 23(2) of the Constitution.

General remarks
